BUT TO DESTRUCT OF THE SECURITY OF THE

PREFACE.

HISTORY has been stilled, "The evidence of time—The light of truth—The school of virtue—The depository of events." It is calculated for the purposes of showing the principles on which states and empires have risen to power, and the errors by which they have fallen into decay, or been totally disfolved: and of pointing out the fatal effects of intestine divisions and civil wars, whether arising from the ambition, weakness, or inattention of princes; or from the mercenary disposition, pride, and salse policy of ministers and statesimen; or from mistaken ideas, and the abuse, of government and liberty. It should oblige all, who have performed any distinguished part on the theatre of the world, to appear before us in their proper character; and to render an account of their actions at the tribunal of posterity, as models which ought to be followed, or as examples to be censured and avoided.

The instructions that events afford, are the foul of history; which doubtless ought to be a true relation of real facts during the period it respects. An effential requisite in an historian is the knowledge of the truth; and as in order to perfection he ought to be superior to every temptation to disguise it: Some have faid, that "he should have neither country, nor particular religion." The compiler of the present history can assure the public, that he has paid a facred regard to truth, conscious of his being answerable to a more awful tribunal than that of the public; and has laboured to divest himself of all undue attachment to every person, country, religious name or profession: whenever the reader is inclined to pronounce him partial, let him recollect. that he also is subject to the like human frailty. A regard to truth has often restrained him from the use of strong and storid expressions, that he might not impose upon the reader a pleasing delusion, and lead him into false conceptions of the events undertaken to be related.

PREFACE

The following work is not confined to the contest between Great-Britain and the United States of America, but includes all the other parts of the war which originated from that contest.

In the beginning of the first letter, the reader is acquainted with the reasons that produced an historical account of the first settlers in the Thirteen Colonies, and of their successors, down to the close of 1771. The insertion of what followed to the commencement of hosiilities, was necessary for the connecting of the two periods.

The form of letters, instead of chapters, is not altogether imaginary, as the author, from his arrival in America in 1770, maintained a correspondence with gentlemen in London, Rotterdam, and Paris, answering in general to the prefixed dates.

He apprehended, that by keeping to fuch form, and making the narrative agree with the moment to which it related, and by introducing the various infertions necessary for the authenticating of facts, a present ideal existence of past events might be produced in the mind, similar to what is felt when a well-executed historical painting is examined. The better to secure this point, several parts are written in the present tense. If the author has failed in the execution, it is hoped that the candid reader will admit of the good intention as an apology.

He has kept, as far as he could, to a chronological order. This has necessarily interrupted the narrative of particular parts; which, though a disappointment to some, may prevent the tediousness that might otherwise have been felt by persons of a different taste. It may at least serve to prevent or correct the too frequent mistakes of ascribing prior events, partly or wholly to subsequent facts. The author regrets his not having given every European letter the immediate resemblance of being written to him by a correspondent. He slatters himself, that he has in some measure compensated for that and other desects, by the general contents of every letter in each volume prefixed to the fame; by a copious index to the whole at the end of the last; and by a set of maps, about which neither care, nor expence, has been spared to render them valuable.

Struck with the importance of the scenes that were opening upon the world, in the beginning of 1776, he formed an early design of compiling their history, which he made known to the late commander in chief of the American army; and meeting with the desired encouragement from him, he applied himself to the procuring of the best materials, whether oral, written, or printed. Oral communications were minuted down while fresh in the memory; the written were directed immediately to himself in many instances, in others only imparted: the productions of the European press could not be received with any regularity or certainty during the war, but were improved as they could be obtained.

The United States, in congress assembled, savored him with an inspection of such of their records as could with propriety be submitted to the perusal of a private person; and he was indulged by the late generals Washington, Gates, Greene, Lincoln, and Otho Williams, with a liberal examination of their papers, both of a public and more private nature.

He had the opportunity of acquainting himfelf with the records of the first settlers in New-England; and examined those of the Massachusetts-bay, from their formation as a company to the close of the war, contained in near thirty solio manuscript volumes.

Doctor Ramsay's history of the war in Carolina, was communicated to him while in manuscript; and liberty was granted to make full use of it: the present opportunity is embraced for acknowledging the benefit received from it, and for returning grateful thanks to the Doctor. The Americans remarked, that Dodsley's Annual Register contained the best foreign printed summary account of affairs: But it was not possible for writers on this fide the Atlantic to avoid mistakes. That Register and other publications have been of service to the compiler of the present work, who has frequently quoted from them, without varying the language, except for method and conciseness. He gathered from every source of intelligence in his power, while at the place of his residence near Boston; and since his return to his native country in 1786, has improved the advantage arising from it.

The accounts here given of American affairs, are so different in several respects from what have been the conceptions of many on each side the Atlantic, that it was necessary to insert a variety of letters, papers and anecdotes, to authenticate the narrative. The publication of these, it is presumed, will obtain credit for such parts as could not with propriety be supported by the introduction of similar proofs.

To write a history worthy the approbation of his friends, and (as far as his power extended) of the present age, and of posserity; and to convince mankind, that TRUTH was his care, his fearch, and what his foul was engaged in, have been the great objects of

RISE, PROGRESS, AND CONCLUSION

LETTER I.

MY GOOD SIR,

To your properly understanding the nature and origin of the uneasiness that has so strongly agitated the colonies of late years, and still exists, though now somewhat abated; and which has been occasioned by parliamentary taxation and the modern measures of government; you must be acquainted with the sentiments and hillory of the sirst-settlers, no less than of their descendants and successors.

Several of the most zealous and eminent protestants, in the reign of Edward the VIth, opposed the populs ceremonies and habits, though otherwise united to their brethren in religious tenets. The opposition became more general and determined, after hundreds of them sled to, and resided in foreign parts, in order to escape the Marian persecutions. There the sentiments of numbers, through their intercourse with protestants of other nations, were much changed and improved; and they were more than ever desirous of proceeding surther in the reformation, than was directed by the service-book of king Edward.

Upon the accession of Elizabeth, the refugees returned to England, [1558.] loaded with experience and learning, but in the utmost distress and poverty. Those of the clergy, who could comply with the queen's establishment, were quickly preferred. The rest, after being admitted to preach, awhile, were suspended, and reduced to former indigence. Several were offered bishoprics, but declined the tender, on account of the garments, ceremonies, &c. while the necessity of the times, and the flattering hope of obtaining hereafter an amendment in the constitution of the church, induced others to accept preferments, though with trembling.

The queen affected much pomp in religion; was fond of the old popith ceremonies, in which she had been educated; and thought her brother king Edward had gone too far in demo-

The clergy and laity, who fought after greater ecclefiastic purity, in vain struggled hard for the abolishment of popish ceremonies and habits; or, at least, leaving the use of them, in divine fervice, indifferent. They obtained nothing but the honorable nick-name of PURITANS. The queen proved an inflexible bigot, and would be obeyed, or punish. The parliament, in their first session, had very injudiciously passed the two acts of supremacy and uniformity, without guarding them properly; and by a clause in the latter, delivered up to the crown all ecclefiastic jurisdiction. Men of solid learning and piety, of fober lives, popular preachers, professed enemies to popery and superstition, and of the same faith, in point of doctrine, with the conformists, were suspended, deprived, imprisoned and ruined, for not complying with the use of those garments and ceremonies, which their opponents acknowledged to be indifferent in themselves; while the sufferers adjudged fuch compliance finful, from their having been abused to idolatry, and ferving as marks and badges of that religion they had renounced.

All the puritans of these times were desirous of remaining in the church, might they be included as to the habits and a few ceremonies, though they were far from being fatisfied with the hierarchy, and had other objections beside those for which they had been deprived. Inflead of indulgence, their grievances were multiplied; and the penal laws were rigoroufly executed. However, the body of the conforming clergy being extremely illiterate and ignorant, the deprived ministers were employed as curates or lecturers; and received, for their fervices, a fmall confideration from the incumbent, together with the voluntary contribution of the parish. By their warm and affectionate preaching and eminent faithfulness, they gained the hearts of the common people, who were the more attached to them, the more cruelty was exercised upon them; and who had the utmost aversion to the popish garments, as their hatred to popery increafed. The preachers appealed to the fcriptures. Their hearers fearched them carefully; obtained more and clearer 'discoveries discoveries of the popula superstitions; grew in their abhorrence of them; venerated the divine inflitutions; and longed to have the worship of the church rendered more pure and primitive.-The popularity of the deprived ministers drew numbers from neighbouring parithes. Puritanism spread and gained ground by being perfecuted. Its growth was the greatest grief to the queen and archbithop Whitgift. But neither the supreme head of the church, nor the primate of all England, had policy or christianity enough to apply the proper remedy, in granting liberty of confrience. Inflead of that, new acts were puffed, and greater feverities practifed. Such inhuman proceedings, against protestants of good moral characters, did not pass unnoticed. They were the subjects of conversation. The right of acting thus toward fellow-creatures, and its non-agreement with the mild and benevolent principles of christianity, were freely canvassed. The supreme head and chief dignitaries of the English church being such intolerable perfecutors, it became a question, " Is the any longer a true church of Christ, and are her ministers true ministers."

At length one Robert Brown, descended from an ancient and honorable samily, and nearly related to Lord Treasurer Cecil, a siery zealot, travelled through the country, [1586.] a second time, holding forth, wherever he went, against bishops, eccle-siastic courts, ordaining of ministers, &c. and gathered a separate congregation. The parties held, that the church of England was not a true church; that her ministers were not rightly ordained; that her discipline was popish and anti-christian; and that all her ordinances and sacraments were invalid. Therefore they would not join with her members in any part of public worship. They not only renounced communion with the church of England, but with all other reformed churches, except they were of their own model.

These separatists were called Brownists, which was long afterward the common name for all that separated totally from the church of England, even when they disowned the rigid principles of Brown and his congregation. We must carefully distinguish the Brownists from the Puritans. Most of the latter were for keeping within the pale of the church, apprehending it to be a true church in its doctrines and sacraments, though defective in discipline and corrupt in ceremonies. They thought it unlawful to separate; submitted to suspensions and deprivations; when driven out of one diocese, took sanctuary in another, being afraid of incurring the guilt of schiss, and were the chief writers against the Brownists.

[1593.] A fresh effort was made to crush the non-conformilis.

A most

A most obnoxious act was passed, for punishing all who refused to come to church, and every one, who perfuaded others to oppose the queen's authority in ecclesiastic causes, or was present at any conventicle or meeting. The punishment was imprisonment without bail, till the convicted agreed to conform and make a declaration of his conformity. In case the offender did not sign the declaration within three months, he was to abjure the realm, and go into perpetual banishment. If he departed not within the time limited, or returned afterward without the queen's licence, he was to fuffer death without benefit of clergy. By this act, the case of non-conformists was worse than that of felons at common law. The flatute was levelled against the laity, no less than the clergy. The moderate puritans evaded it, by going to church when prayers were nearly ended, and by receiving the facrament when administered with fome latitude. The weight of it fell upon the Brownists, whose sentiments had gained ground, for that they were increased to near twenty thousand, beside wives and children, according to the opinion of Sir Walter Raleigh, given in the house of commons, when the bill was read the fecond time and debated *.

Several were put to death, about this period; which excited an odium against the bishops and high commissioners, who were universally known to have been at the bottom of the proceedings against them. It was resolved therefore, to send the remainder of the imprisoned into banishment, instead of continuing to execute them. Others preferred a voluntary exile, rather than be exposed to the merciless perfecutions that awaited them in their native country. Is it strange, that these persons, thus forced or frightened out of it, for claiming and exercising the common right of human nature, that of judging for themselves in matters of religion, should at length think, that their allegiance terminated with their departure; or, that those who commissioned

The parliament, especially the lower house, perceiving how the queen, and many of the bishops and ecclesiastics abused their spiritual power; what mischiefs they brought upon the church; and the miseries to which honest men were reduced for mere difference in religious sentiments; attempted repeatedly to regulate matters, and to redress the hardships of the non-conformiss, but was stopt by her majesty in the most distatorial manner. Some of the members, roused by such unwarrantable acts of sovereignty, spake boldly and freely upon the occasion, and censured the arbitrary proceedings of the bishops. The queen added to her other faults, that of sending them to the

Tower. But, though she could awe the parliament, imprison its members, and protect her favorite bishops; she could not overnower the confciences of the non-conformists.

A number of religious people, upon the borders of Nottinghamshire, Lincolnshire, and Yorkshire, having suffered persecution patiently for years, and searched the scriptures diligently, were at length sully of opinion, that the ceremonies of the English church were unlawful; that the lordly power of her prelates was contrary to the freedom of the gospel; and that her offices, courts and canons had no warrant in the word of God; but were popish. They determined therefore to shake off that yoke of bendage, viz. human impositions, brought into the church by popish policy and power, against the superior law of Christ, the genius of his plain religion, and christian liberty. They resolved, [1602.] as the Lord's free people, "to join themselves by covenant into a church state; and, agreeable to present or future knowledge, to walk in all the ways of God, according to their best abilities, whatever it costs them "."

The affembly, [1606.] owing to the diffance of habitations, was obliged to form itself into two diffinct religious societies; the one, with which is our concern, foon had for its paftor the famous Mr. John Robinson. The church kept together about a year; but being extremely harraffed by perfecutors, concluded upon removing to Holland. The pious refugees repaired to and fettled at Amsterdam; but after a while removed to Leyden; where they were highly respected, and would have been allowed fome public favor, had it not been for fear of offending England. By hard and continued labour they obtained a living. The Dutch employed them before others, for their honest and exemplary behaviour; and readily truffed them when in want of money. Matters, however, were not altogether to their mind; [1617.] and some of the most sensible began to think of another removal. It was imagined, that, if a better and cafter place of living could be had, numbers would join them. The morals of the Dutch were too dissolute; and they were afraid, that their offspring would become irreligious. Beside, they had an ardent, noble, and godly defire, of laying a foundation for fpreading the religion of Jesus over the remote regions of the earth; and of handing down to future ages, what they thought to be, the pure and unadulterated worship of the great IEHOVAH. They therefore directed their views to America. To those who objected-the length and danger of the voyage, the difficulties and calamities to which they should be exposed, the barbarities and treacheries of the Indians, and their inability to support the expence—it was answered, "The difficulties are not invincible, and may be overcome by fortitude and patience; the ends proposed are good and honorable; the cailing lawful and urgent; the blessing of God may therefore be expected. We live but as exiles now, and are in a poor condition. The truce with the Spaniards is hastening to a close. Nothing but preparations for war are going forward. The Spaniards may be as cruel as the Savages; and samine and pestilence may be as fore in Holland as in America."

After ferious and folemn application to God for direction, they concluded on carrying the proposal of crossing the Atlantic into execution; endeavouring to live in a distinct body by themselves, under the general government of the Virginia company; and fuing to his majesty, king James, for full livery and freedom of conscience.

The Virginia company were ready to give them a patent, with as ample privileges as they could grant; but, notwithstanding the great interest made by gentlemen of the first character, and by the chief fecretary of state, the king and bishops refused to allow the refugees (though at the distance of 3000 miles) liberty of conscience under the royal seal. All they could obtain from his majesty, was a promise that he would connive at, and not molest them, provided they carried theinfelves peaceably; but he would not tolerate them by his public authority. Upon this occasion. it was wifely observed, "If his majesty's promise is no security, a further confirmation will be of little value; though it has a feal as broad as the house floor, it will not serve the turn, for there will be means enough found, when wanted, to recall or reverfeit; and we must rest herein on God's providence." This reasoning, and the hope of being placed beyond the reach of ecclefiaftic courts, prevailed. They refolved, to venture; and, after long attendance, much cost and labor, obtained a patent.

They agreed, that the minor part of younger and stronger men, with Mr. Brewsler, an elder of the church, should go first, and that the pastor, Mr. Robinson, should remain behind with the majority, for a future favorable opportunity. Their enemies whispered, that the states of Holland were weary of their company; but the reverse was evident from the following occurrence, viz. the magistrates of the city, when reproving the Walloons in open court, said, "These English have lived now ten years among us, and yet we never had any accusation against any of them,

The colony deflined for America, failed from Delft-Haven for Southampton, July 22, 1620; and there met a thip, having fome Englith friends on board, who proposed removing with them.—

Both vessels proceeded to sea; but returned twice into port, on account of defects in the one from Delft, which was difmitfed. Part of the company returned to London, the remainder betook themselves to the thip, and failed from Plymouth the 6th of September. After many delays, difficulties and dangers, they made Cape Cod at break of day on the 9th of November, and entered the harbor on the 10th. They offered up their devout and ardent acknowledgments to God for his protection, and had thoughts of landing; but remarking, that they were out of the limits of their patent, and in a fort reduced to a state of nature; and hearing fome, who came from London, hint, there is now no authority over us; they, while on board, formed themselves into a Civil Body Politic under the crown of England, for the purpose of framing "just and equal laws, ordinances, acts, constitutions and offices," to which they promifed "all due submission and obedience." This contract was subscribed by forty-one persons, on Saturday the 11th of November. The whole company of fettlers, men, women, children and fervants, amounted to no more than one hundred and one, the exact number that left England-for one had died, but another was born upon the passage.

Enfeebled and fickly, we now behold them at the distance of 3000 miles, not only from their native country, but the hospitable land where they lately refided for years, when unfeeling perfecution drove them into a voluntary banishment. They have a long and dreary winter before them, and are upon the strange coast of an uncultivated wilderness, without a relation or friend to welcome their arrival, or an house to shelter them; without even a kind inhabitant to comfort them by tender acts of humanity, much less a civilized town or city, from which succour may be obtained on an emergency. Thus circumstanced, they are employed in making discoveries, till the 20th of December, when they conclude upon a place for immediate settlement, which they afterward name New-Plymouth, in grateful remembrance of the last town they lest in their native country.

The winter proved remarkably mild * for the American climate, though exceffively fevere to an English constitution; and, what with disorders brought upon them through uncommon labours and fatigues, and their being exposed to the rigors of the season; and what with the scurvy and other diseases occasioned by a tedious voyage, and the want of proper accommodations while making it, they buried by the end of March, 1621, forty-four of their little society, of whom one and twenty were subscribers to the contract. The number of their dead increased to safety by the beginning of November, when, to their great joy, a veffel arrived with thirty-five fettlers from London. It was years before their plantation amounted to three hundred people: when nearly fo, the Council established at Plymouth, in the country of Devon, for the planting, ruling, ordering and governing of New-England in America, granted them a Patent, [Jan. 13, 1630.] by which their lands were secured against all English claims.—Be it noted, that they early agreed with, and satisfied the Indian proprietors.

It would have been aftonishing, had not these planters brought with them opinions favorable to liberty. The arbitrary proceedings of Elizabeth and James produced a spirit of inquiry; and induced the fufferers and others to canvals the equity of those powers, which were so improperly exercised. When the film of prejudice was removed, it was easy to discern that tyranny, whether in church or flate, could not be vindicated by reason or revelation; and that Heaven's permitting it, was no more a countenance to that, than any other wickedness. Beside, the Plymouthians had lived for many years among a people, who had been engaged in a bloody war, with a cruel unrelenting tyrant, whose fovereignty they had renounced. The frequent conversation that must have passed between the Dutch and English refugees, must have improved the attachment of the last to the cause of freedom. It might also have been hinted to them, that it began to be the fentiment of fome English nobles and principal commoners, that in case of a removal to America, persons, without any charter from the crown, were at liberty to establish what form of government they pleafed; and to fet up a new flate, as fully to all intents and purposes, as though they were making their first entrance into civil fociety.

No wonder then, especially considering the general equality prevailing among them, that the Plymouthians, by their contract before landing, formed themselves into a proper Democracy; and that it was entered in the Plymouth records of [Nov. 15, 1636,] " Finding, that as free-born subjects of the state of ENGLAND, we hither came with all and fingular the privileges belonging to fuch; in the first place we think good, that it be established for an act, that, according to the [rights supposed to be wanting | and due privileges of the subjects oforesaid, no imposition, law or ordinance be made or imposed upon them at present or to come; but such as shall be made and imposed by consent, according to the free liberties of free-born subjects of the flate and kingdom of ENGLAND. and no otherwise." They meant to continue their allegiance to the crown; to retain their connection with the mother country; to adopt the general laws of England for the rule of government, wherein

wherein they fuited; and to be governed by their own particular acts in other instances.

Perfons, devoted to church authority and particular national establishments, may exclaim against the Plymouthians for their religious sentiments: but a fair and brief statement of them, it is apprehended, will be thought the best defence that can be offered, by those who candidly examine the New Testament, and are properly impressed with the words of our Saviour—My kingdom is not of this world.

Vol. I.

When Mr. Robinson and his affociates separated from the church of England, they were rigid Brownists. After his removal to Holland, and there conversing with learned divines, he being a gentleman of a liberal mind and good disposition, became moderate, as did his people; fo that they who continued rigid Brownills would hardly hold communion with them. Mr. Rotinfon and his fociety did not require of those wto joined them, a renunciation of the church of England. They also acknowledged the other reformed churches for true and genuine; allowed their own members occasional communion with them, in the word preached, and in the prayers conceived by the preacher before and after fermon, but not in the facraments and discipline; and admitted their members, known to them to be pious, to occalional communion with themselves in the sacraments. Still it is to be remarked, that they were not admitted, because of their being members of fuch churches, but on account of their known piety: their belonging to and continuing in fuch churches, was not an argument for rejecting them; nor was it the argument for their reception. Mr. Robinson, however, by his conversation. and writings, proved a principal in ruining Brownifm; and, in the opinion of some was the father, of others the restorer, of the independent or congregational churches. Congregational is the term used in New-England, the other is discarded, as seeming to imply too great a feparation from fifter churches.

The Plymouthians held, that the Bible was the fele religious code of proteflants; and that every man had a right to judge for himfelf, and to try all doctrines by it, and to worthip according to what he apprehended that directed. In doctrinal teness they agreed with the articles of the church of England. The main difference between them and other reformed churches, was about hierarchy. They maintained, that no particular church ought to confift of more perfons than could worship in one congregation; that every man ought, in appearance, to be a true believer in Christ, and subject to his authority; that when there was a suitable number of such believers, who thought themselves bound in conscience to do it, they had a right to imbody into a church, by some certain contract or covenant, expressed or implied; and that, being imbodied, they were to choose all their officers, who were paftors or teaching elders, mere ruling elders meant to affift the former, and qualified to teach occasionally. and deacons who were to manage the temporalities of the church, to take care of the poor, and to officiate at the Lord's table by providing the bread and wine, laying the cloth, carrying the elements, &c. [The custom of having ruling elders has now ceased. The elders of both kinds were to form the presbytery of overfeers and rulers. They also held, that no churches or church officers had any power over other churches or officers, to control or impose upon them, all having equal rights and privileges. Their own officers were removable by them upon justifiable reasons; in case of capital errors, gross miscondust and the like. When they baptifed, they rejected the fign of the cross, and other ceremonies not enjoined by scripture. They received the elements of the Lord's supper, in the table posture of the day and place in which they lived. Excommunication they deemed to be wholly spiritual; and denied, that the church or its officers had any authority to inflict temporal pains and penalties. They confidered no days as holy, but the Lord's day. which they observed with great strictness. Solemn fastings and thankfgivings, as the aspects of Providence required, they had a pious regard to, as agreeable to both natural and revealed religion.

A better fet of emigrants never croffed the Atlantic. "They were a plain, frugal, industrious, conscientious, and loving people; and, for the day in which they lived, and considering their education, possessed a good thare of politeness. The important light in which they viewed morality, led them, in many instances, to such critical exactness, as would be deemed by the moderns ridiculous; from thence, however, the community derived substantial benefits. They have been stigmatized as enthusiass; but nothing like enthusiasm is to be met with in the records of any of their transactions, either civil or ecclesiastic. Their piety indeed was eminent and fervent, but it was also rational; and their religion was that of the Bible, and had a proper influence upon their conduct."

The Plymonthians having cleared the way for other sufferers to settle in America; with less difficulty and danger than what they had experienced; the same of their plantation spreading through the western parts of England; and the government in church and state growing more and more oppressive; the territory of the Massackus Bay was purchased of the Plymouth-Council, [1628.] and a company soon formed, who consulted on fettling a plantation, to which non-conforming puritans might emigrate in order to enjoy their own principles in full fecurity. Their fufferings had been moderated for a few years before Elizabeth's death. The queen was far advanced in life; the next heir to the crown was a prefbyterian, who had fubfcribed to the Scotch national covenant, and, with hands uplifted to heaven, had pronounced, "The Scotch kirk is the pureft in the world, and the fervice of the kirk of England an evil faid mass in English, that wants nothing of the mass but the liftings:" he had interceded for some of the persecuted ministers; and the bishops were cautious of acting against a party, for whom king James had declared; but upon his afcending the throne, the fears of the high church-men and the hopes of the non-conformists were foon ended. It was not long before the king became in the church a furious perfecutor of the non-conformists, and in the state as errant a despot as his cowardice would allow. In fligmatizing for Puritans, all who flood by the laws of the land and opposed his arbitrary government, though firenuous churchmen, he strengthened the cause of the church-puritans: the former, called by way of distinction state-puritans, joining the latter, both together became at length the majority of the nation.

Still the times were not mended; and the death of Junes made way for their becoming much worfe. King Charles unfortunately took for his bosom counsellor, in religious affairs, bishop Laud, the most unqualified person for the purpose of any to be found in his three kingdoms: he also resigned himself up to arbitrary councils.

The lowering prospect thickened apace; the Massachuseits company therefore provided a fafe retreat, in feason. They applied immediately to the improvement of their purchased territory; and fent out Capt. John Endicott and others, with fervants, to begin a plantation; who arrived at (what is now named) Salem. They foon after petitioned for a royal charter, hoping that their existence and powers would be thereby secured and promoted. They fucceeded, and a charter of incorporation was granted, [March 4, 1629,] making them a body politic, by the name of "The Governor and Company of the Maffachusetts-Bay in New-England," with as full powers as any other corporation in the realm of England. The grant and fale of the Plymouth-Council was confirmed. Till the annual election by the company could commence, the governor, deputy-governor, and eighteen affishants were specified. The mode of governing, and of admitting freemen was prescribed. They were empowered to elect and constitute such other officers, as might be thought requilite requifite for the managing of their affairs; and to make laws and ordinances, not contrary to the laws and statutes of the realm. for the good of the faid company, and the government of their lands and plantation, and the inhabitants thereof. They were allowed to transport persons, whether subjects or strangers, weapons, merchandize, &c. any law to the contrary notwithflanding—fuch was the dispensing power the king assumed. He also exempted them from paying custom or subsidy for seven years: the governor and company, their factors and affigns, were to pay neither that nor any taxes IN New-England for the fame space. All were freed from duties upon goods imported or exported for 21 years, except the old 5 per cent. custom upon imports after the expiration of the feven years. All his majefty's fubjects going to and inhabiting the company's lands, together with their children, were-to enjoy all the liberties of free and natural fubjects, within any of his dominions, the fame as though born in England. The king could mean only, that, by removing to and residing in the Massachuseus, they should not forfeit for themselves or children, the privileges of Englishmen, and be treated as foreigners; and not, that they should be governed by laws and officers of their own making or choofing, personally or by representation; for they were evidently distinguished from the governor and company (of whom it appears to be supposed, that they were to remain in England) as these were authorised to administer the oaths of supremacy and allegiance to all and every person or persons, who should hereafter go to inhabit the lands and premises of the company. Beside, the governor and company were entrufted with the power of making laws, ordinances, &c. not contrary to the laws of England; of fettling the government, and magistracy of the plantation; and its inhabitants; of naming all the officers; and of fetting forth their feveral duties, powers and limits; and the king commanded that all fuch laws, ordinances, &c. should be published, in writing, under the common feal of the company, and thereupon be carefully observed and put into execution, according to their true meaning. The charter * does not once mention liberty of confience or toleration; though one thistorian has inadversantly advanced, that "free liberty of confcience was likewife granted to all who should settle in the Massachusetts-Bay, to worship God in their own way;" and another ‡, " the charter granted toleration to all christians, except papitts." The affertions apply only to the charter granted by king William and queen Mary.

[April

[April 30, 1629.] The company, in the exercise of their chartered powers, determined that a governor and council of twelve, residing on the plantation, should have the sole ordering of its affairs and government. They appointed Captain Endicott governor, and seven gentlemen going from England to be counsellors, and directed how the other five should be elected, together with a deputy-governor and fecretary.

Mess. Higginson, Skelton, Bright, John and Samuel Browne were of the feven counfellors nominated by the company. The three first, being ministers, had declared themselves to be of one judgment, and to be fully agreed in the manner how to exercise their ministry. The company's committee in their letter to governor Endicott, expressed good hopes on account of it; and at the same time recommended Messrs. John and Samuel Browne as men whom they much respected, being fully persuaded of their fincere affections to the good of the plantation *. The ministers and passengers coming to settle in it were episcopally inclined when they left England; though they could not conform to many ceremonies and customs, nor fubmit to, what they judged different corruptions, imposed upon their consciences by the king and prelates. They were also strongly prejudiced against the feparatists, in which class the Plymouthians were numbered. But long before they arrived, or even failed, a Dr. Fuller, a deacon of the church at Plymouth, and well verfed in its difcipline, having been fent for, on account of a fatal fickness which broke out among the emigrants after their arrival at Salem, 1 ad, by his conversation with Captain Endicott, taken off the ill effect of common report, and brought him to think favorably of the outward form of worship espoused by the Plymouthians. The influence of the doctor's intercourse with the Sal m fettlers cannot be thought to have been confined to the Captain. When the business of organizing a church was brought forward after the arrival of the counfellors, the matter was frequently canvalled, and at length it was determined to form it, nearly upon the plan of the one at Plymouth; and to invite the latter to be present, by their messengers, at the solemn ordination of the ministers Messrs. Skelton and Higginson, [August 6.] Notwithflanding crofs winds the Plymouth messengers were time enough to give the right hand of fellowship, by which ceremony the two churches professed mutual affection and communion.

Probably, none of the newly arrived fettlers had the least idea of such ecclesiastic proceedings, when they lest England; but thought very differently. Some continued to do so; for Mr. Bright, disagreeing in judgment from the other ministers, removed to a distance before their ordination; and Messer. John and Samuel Browne, distatisfied with the proceedings of the society, separated with several who were like minded, and sat up another. Governor Endicott, being of a hot temper, and not possessed of the greatest prudence, summoned the brothers before him, as ringleaders of a faction; and apprehending that their conversation and conduct would occasion divisions, sent them back to England, against their own inclination, notwithstanding their being counsellors, thinking himself justified by his public orders.

Let us return to the Company in England.

[July 28.] Mr. Matthew Craddock, the governor, proposed at the general court, that, for the advancement of the plantation, the encouragement of persons of worth and quality to transplant themselves and families, and other weighty reasons, the government of the plantation should be transferred to its inhabitants, and not be continued in subordination to the company at London. The matter was debated; and it was agreed, that the perfons present should seriously consider the business against the next general court; it was also requested, that they would in the mean while, conduct with that privacy, that the affair might not be divulged. At a month's end they met, and confented that the government and patent should be settled in New-England, if it could be done legally. They foon after received letters respecting the difference between governor Endicott and Mesfrs. John and Samuel Browne; and searing that these two had in their private letters defamed the plantation, they opened and read a number of them, and ordered that none from Mr. Samuel Browne should be delivered; however, upon application from the brothers, they directed that they should have a copy of the accufation fent against them from New-England. The company's letters upon this business, one to Messrs. Skelton and Higginson, and another to governor Endicott, intimated, that there had been in the parties addressed a degree of intemperance; that direct or oblique aspersions had been thrown out against the state; and that undigested counsels had been too suddenly put into execution. They belides expressed an apprehension, lest, through an ill construction, the same might make the company obnoxious to any adverfary *.

The difference that happened in the plantation, the treatment of the Brownes, and the reports circulated by them, undoubtedly occasioned much talk. Many would think it strange, that, while the charter was totally filent upon the head of religion, and several of the grantees and company, though strongly opposed to the tyrannies of the high church-men, were real episcopalians, persons of this profession should be debarred the right of worshipping according to their own judgment and conscience, and be even expelled the plantation. These occurrences most probably forwarded the plan of Mr. Craddock. The advice of learned council was ordered to be taken, and it was considered how to execute the projected removal without offending government.

Among the other weighty reasons which induced them to remove, we must include the hope of getting beyond the reach of Laud and the high commission court: for the Massachusetts general court declared in 1651, "That seeing just cause to fear the persecution of the then bishop and high commission, for not conforming to the ceremonies, they thought it their safest course to get to this outside of the world (America) out of their view.

[October 20.] The company, at a general court, proceeded to a new election of officers, who were to repair to and fettle in New-England. 'They chose for governor John Winthrop, esq. of Groton, in Suffolk, a gentleman well known for his piety, liberality, wisdom and gravity. The business of transferring the patent and corporation, and of taking over new fettlers, was profecuted with vigor. The enterprise produced a general rumour, as its extent and magnitude, the number and principles of the persons engaging in it, opened upon the public. The intentions of the parties being suspected, and jealousies arising concerning them, governor Winthrop and other gentlemen, to remove prejudices, conciliate the minds of the difaffected, and recommend themselves and their expedition to the favorable regards of all ferious christians of the episcopal persuasion, addieffed their brethren in and of the church of England, [April 7. 1630. and afterward failed from Yarmouth in the ifle of Wight. for America. The figners of the address, pray in the most folemn manner to be confidered as their brethren, and defire it to be noted, that the principals and body of their company esteem it their honor to call the church of ENGLAND their dear mother. They acknowledge, that fuch hope and part as they have obtained in the common falvation, they have received in her bosom, and sucked from her breasts. They declare themfeives members of her body; and that, while they have breath, they shall fincerely endeavour her welfare. They pronounce themselves a church springing out of her own bowels. professions are made in the strongest language *.

[June 12.] The company arrived at Salem; and foon were in number more than fifteen hundred persons, from different counties in England. They applied themselves early to the forming of churches; but, the Rev. Mr. Cotton (who came from Boston in Lincolnstate to take leave of his departing friends at Southampton) having told them to advise with the Plymouthians and to do nothing to offend them, and a precedent existing in the church at Salem, they dismissed all the peculiarities of episcopacy, and preferred the congregational mode in general. However, they had no settled plan of church discipline, till after the arrival of Mr. Cotton, [1633.] who was considered as a kind of oracle in both civil and facred matters, and gradually moulded all their church administrations, and thus determined the ecclesiastic constitution of the colony; therein verifying what Mr. Robinson had judiciously predicted, when he said, "Many of those who have both wrote and preached against me and my people, were they in a place where they could have liberty and live comfortably, would do as we do "."

Governor Winthrop inferted, in his manufcript history, a couple of anecdotes, of an earlier date than Mr. Cotton's arrival, which may amuse you. "July 30, 1631, Mr. Ludlow in digging the foundation of his house at Dorchester, found two pieces of French money, one was coined 1596. They were in feveral places, above a foot within the firm ground." " June 13, 1632, At Watertown there was, in the view of divers witneffes, a great combat between a moufe and a fnake; and after a long fight, the mouse prevailed and killed the fnake." The minister of Boston, Mr. Wilson, a very sincere holy man, gives this interpretation—" The fnake is the devil, the mouse is a poor contemptible people whom God has brought hither, and who shall overcome Satan here, and dispossess him of his kingdom." "At the fame time he told the governor, that before he refolved to come into the country, he dreamed that he was here, and faw a church arise out of the earth, which grew up and became a marvellous goodly church." He might think his dream divine; but it is easily accounted for as a common event, stiffing with the church-building out of a lively imagination, warmed and directed by a preponderating inclination. If, inflead of interpreting the combat, he had only mentioned, that the event fuggefled to him fuch though s, and fach an improvement, he would have evidenced more judgment and an equal degree of wildom in feizing the happy circumstance.

The colony increased apace, by frequent and numerous accessions. But "it appears by privite letters, that the departure of so many of the bell, both ministers and private christians, did breed and thoughts in those behind of the Lord's intention in the work, and an apprehension of some evil days to come upon England; yea, it began to be viewed by the council as a matter of state, so that warrants were sent to stay the ships, and to call in the patent; but, upon the petition of the ship-masters, alledging how beneficial the plantation was, they were released: Mr. Craddock, however, had strict charge to deliver in the patent, and wrote to the company to send it home upon receipt of his letter. [July, 1634.] The governor and assistants consulted about it, and resolved to answer Mr. Craddock, but not to return any answer or excuse to the council for the present *."

On the death of the duke of Buckingham, Laud became the king's prime minister in all affairs of both church and state; and, on the death of archbishop Abbot, he was exalted to the see of Canterbury. Possessed fuch powers, he, by his pliant tools, made havock of the church, haling and committing to proson conscientious ministers and laymen, who would not bend to his antiscriptural impositions, so that the people were scattered abroad, and passed over the Atlantic into America. The daily inroads of the court, on the civil rights of the subject, helped forward the emigration.

From the beginning of the colony, until the emigration ceafed, through a change of affairs in England, [1640.] there arrived in 298 veffels about 21200 fettlers (men, women and children) or 4000 families, but they did not all confine themselves to the Maffachusetts. Notwithstanding the numbers that repaired thither, when Josselvn visited Boston, in 1638, "he found it rather a village than a town, there being not above 20 or 30 houses." These settlers were no less strenuous for their own particular rights and privileges than the Plymouthians. When the governor and company removed from London to the Maffachufetts, they renounced the appearance of a corporation, and affumed the form of a commonwealth, varying, as it funed them, from the directions of the charter. The change of place and circumstances prevented their keeping to it in certain instances, though not in others; but they could eafily fatisfy themselves as to any violations; for "they apprehended themselves subject to no other laws or rules of government, than what arose from natural reason and the principles of equity, except any positive rules from the word of God +." Persons of influence among them held, that birth was no necessary cause of subjection; for that the subject of any prince or state, had a natural right to remove to any other flate or quarter of the world, when deprived of liberty of conscience; and that upon such removal his subjection ceased. They called their own a voluntary civil subjection, arifing merely from a mutual compact between them and the king, founded upon the charter. By this compact they acknowledged themselves bound; so that they could not be subject to or feek protection from any other prince, neither could make laws repugnant to those of England, &c. but, on the other hand, they maintained, that they were to be governed by laws made by themselves, and by officers of their own electing*. They meant to be independent of English parliaments; and therefore, when their intimate friends were become leading members in the house of commons, and they were advifed, on account of the great liberty to which king Charles left the parliament, to fend over fome to folicit for them, and had hopes given that they might obtain much, the governor and affiftants, after meeting in council upon the occasion, " declined the motion, for this confideration, that, if they should put themselves under the protection of the parliament, they must then be subject to all such laws as they should make, or at least such as they might impose upon them, in which courfe, (though they should intend their good, yet) it might prove very prejudicial to them †."

^{*} Governor Winthrop's ME. History.

Whatever approbation such sentiments may meet with from the friends of liberty, these must regret the inconsistencies to which human nature is fubject, in those very persons whose experience fhould have taught them, to do unto others, as they would that others fhould have done unto them, when they themfelves were fuffering under the relentless hand of arbitrary government. But, what is man! [May 18, 1631.] So early as the fecond general court after the arrival of the governor and company, inflead of refolving to admit all the fuitable and deferving, to a generous participation of their freedom, they paffed the pernicious and difingenuous order, " For time to come no man shall be admitted to the freedom of this body politic, but fuch as are members of fome of the churches, within the limits of the fame t." They foon after concluded, that none but fuch fhould fhare in the administration of civil government, or have a voice in any election. Thus a powerful and mischievous alliance was formed between the churches and the state. The ascendency of the clergy was secured and much increased; for no one could be proposed to the church for a member, unless the minister allowed it. The ministers were consulted by the general court, in all matters of great moment; and nothing was determined in fuch cases, without a formal reference to them; who, of course, used their influence with the people, to procure an approbation of the measures which they themselves had advised...

[May, 1634.] Instead of the freemen's appearing personally in the general court, they for the first time sent deputies, to the number of twenty-four. This was a variation from the charter, which gave no power to admit representatives. These with the governor, deputy-governor, and affistants, formed the legislature of the colony, met and voted together in one apartment till March 1644, when it was ordained, that the governor and affistants, should sit apart: and thus commenced the house of representations.

The general court affumed spiritual jurisdiction. Being church members, they might suppose they represented the churches, no less than the colony. [March 8, 1636.] They would approve of no churches, after a certain period, unless they had the approbation of the magistrates and elders of most of the churches within the colony; nor would admit to freedom any of their members. They preffed colonial uniformity in religion, till they became perfecutors. † Whatever apology may be made for the treatment given to episcopalians, baptists and quakers, the colony cannot be cleared from the charge of perfecuting: that, however, will not justify those who persecute with reproaches and ill-will the prefent generation, now reprobating the intolerance of their forefathers, which at that period was, more or lefs, the flain of most religious parties. "It was not peculiar to the Maffachufetts people to think themselves bound in conscience, to use the sword of the civil magistrate to convince, or cut off heretics, that fo they might not infect the church, or injure the public peace ." The true grounds of liberty of conscience, were not then known or embraced by many fects of christians. But remember, that the Maffachufetts-Bay now furpasses the mother country, in its regard for the facred and civil rights of mankind. It not only exempts those of other denominations from paying to the support of its own colonial establishments, the congregational churches; and has been a great number of years in this laudable practice; but it protects all protestants without requiring any qualifying subscriptions or tests, and excludes none by partial laws from the exercise of civil power.

The government was in divers respects absolute. Both magistrates and general court often judged and punished, in a summary way, without a jury, according to discretion, as occa-

fions occurred. It was four years before it was enacted or ordered, that no trial should pass upon any for life or banishment, but by a jury of freemen: and within three years after, [1637,] that law was violated even by the general court. They exercised, while sitting, legislative, judicial and executive powers—a practice which must ever be dangerous to the rights of a people, even when allowed to their own annual representatives.

The country at length grew uneafy at these proceedings; were suspicious that the general court affected arbitrary government; and earnessly expected a body of laws to direct and protect them in all their just rights and privileges. It was the more necessary to comply with the prevailing expectation, for the business had been long in agitation: not only so, but a great majority of the inhabitants were not freemen, not being members of the congregational churches, or declining to take up their freedom, in order to secure an exemption from serving in civil offices. It was not till 1648 that the body of laws was digested and printed.

The conduct of the colony on the one hand, and the inveteracy of the English administration on the other, would certainly have produced a revocation of the charter, and probably the ruin of the plantation, had not the disturbances in England prevented. It became a favorite, upon the change that followed them; and, while Oliver Cromwell ruled, met with the utmost indulgence. From 16.40 to 1660, it approached very near to an independent commonwealth.† The house of commons, in a memorable refolve of the 10th of March, 1642, passed in favor of it, gives New-England the title of kingdom.‡ The commissioners for New-England, sent over by king Charles II. affert in their narrative §, that the colony solicited Cromwell to be declared a free state, which is not unlikely.

It has been already mentioned, that all the persons pushing over to the M. flachusetts did not confine themselves to that colony.

[1635.] Several families removed to Connedicut river, by mutual agreement with their fellow emigrants that remained behind. Plantations were formed at Hartford, Windfor and Weathersfield. The inhabitants being foon after fully fatisfied, that they were out of the Massachusetts limits, and of course jurisdiction, entered into a combination among themselves, [1639.] became a body politic, without restraining the freedom of their civil government to the membership of their churches; and proceeded to the choice of magistrates and representatives.

By the articles of government, it was determined that there fhould be annually two general courts; and that no person should be chosen governor more than once in two years. But it must be observed, that the same year, in which the families removed from the Maffachufetts, Lords Say and Brooke, with other gentlemen, having obtained a grant, John Winthrop, efq; was appointed governor, took possession of Connecticut river, and began to erect a fort (which he called Say-Brooke) to fecure the mouth of it. He was supplied with men, provisions, and all things necessary, by a vessel from England, sent by the grantees, which arrived the latter end of November. Some of the grantees had in contemplation to transport themselves, families and effects, to the territory they had obtained; but the defign of emigrating was laid afide, when matters began to take a new turn in their native country; and at length the agent, Mr. Fenwick, was authorised to dispose of their lands, which were purchased, in 1644, by the people who had removed from the Massachusetts.

with passengers from London. Great pains were taken to prevail upon them to remain in the colony; but they hoped by removing to a considerable distance, to be out of the reach of a general governor, with whom the country was then threatened. They sent to their friends in Connecticut to purchase of the natives the lands lying between them and Hudson's river. They laid the foundation of a slourishing colony, of which New-Haven was the capital. They, as Connecticut, formed a government, much like the Massachusetts, by a voluntary agreement, without any charter, or commission, or authority whatsoever, from the crown or other powers in England. They admitted no one to any office, civil or military, or to have a voice in any election, except he was a member of one of the churches in New-England. They had no jury, either in civil or criminal cases.

Connecticut and New-Haven continued two distinct colonies for many years. At length the general court of Connecticut determined to prefer an address and petition to Charles II. professing their subjection and loyalty to his majesty, and soliciting a royal charter; and John Winthrop, esq; who had been chosen governor, was appointed to negociate the affair with the king. He succeeded and a royal charter was obtained, April 23, 1662, constituting the two colonies for ever one body corporate and politic. New-Haven took the affair ill; and for some time declined the union. But difficulties were amicably settled at last, and the colonies united by agreement. [1665.]

The royal charter citabilished a pure democracy. Every power, as well deliberative as active, was invested in the freemen of the corporation or their delegates, and the colony was under no obligation to communicate the acts of their local legislature to the king. It was the same as to the royal charter, granted the next year to Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations*.

[1685.] In July various articles of high misdemeanor were exhibited against the governor and company of Connecticut, and orders were given to iffue a writ of quo warranto forthwith against the colony. The next year two writs were served by Mr. Randolph; and after them a third in December. This is taken notice of by the governor and company in their letter of Jan. 26, 1686-7, wherein they mention their readiness to submit to his majesty's royal commands; and that, " if it be to conjoin them with the other colonies and provinces under Sir Edmund Andros, it would be more pleasing than to be joined with any other province." Such professed submission probably prevented the quo warranto's being profecuted with effect; and produced an order to Andros to accept the furrender of the charter and the fubmission of the colony. Sir Edmund went to Hartford in October; but when at night he expected the charter would have been furrendered into his hands, the candle was blown out, and the charter withdrawn from the table, carried off and fecreted by one of the company: whose extraordinary fervice was afterwards rewarded by the general affembly with five shillings, agreeable to the plain simple manners of the people. He however published in the general court his orders and commission, which every one tacitly obeyed. He dissolved the former government, and assumed the administration, receiving into his legislative council the late governor and secretary, for the better carrying on the business of the colony. The subsequent revolution in England brought matters back, after a while, to their former course; as the legal validity of the charter was admitted.

The peopling of these three last colonies was owing chiefly to the Puritan Ministers, who, being filenced at home, repaired to New-England, that they might enjoy liberty of conscience; and drew after them vast numbers of their friends and favorers. They amounted to seventy-seven before 1641; and though all were not persons of the greatest learning and abilities, they had a better share of each than most of their neighbouring clergy, at that period; and were men of eminent sobriety and virtue, plain, ferious, affectionate preachers, exactly conformable to the doctrines of the church of England, and laboured much to promote a reformation of manners in their feveral parishes.— Many planters, who accompanied or followed them, were gentlemen of confiderable fortunes and of no mean education, who spent their estates in New-England, and were at the charge of bringing over many poor families, that were not able of themselves to bear the expence. The body of Lity and clergy, collectively confidered, furnishes such a glorious constellation of characters, as would employ the pen of a first-rate writer to do them justice; notwithstanding what has been above remarked of their governmental missake.

The dangers to which the New-England colonies were early exposed, induced them to think of confederating for their mutual fastety. Articles were drawn up in 1638; but they were not finished and ratified till the seventh of September, 1643; from which time we are to look upon Plymouth, Massachusetts, Connecticut and New-Haven as one body, in regard to all public transactions with their neighbours, though the private affairs of each colony were still managed by their own courts and magistrates.

Pass we on to the settlement of the other New-England

Mr. Roger Williams, who succeeded Mr. Skelton, upon his decease, as pastor of the church at Salem, being banished from the Massachusetts, repaired with twelve companions to the Narraganset country, [1635.] and had land given him by the Indian Sachem Canonicus; of whom he afterwards purchased the large tract, lying between Pawtucket and Pawtuxet rivers (the great falls and the little falls; as the Indian names fignify,) and filled it Providence " from a fense of God's merciful providence to him in his diffress." The authority and power of Miantonomy, another Sachem, and his uncle Canonicus, awed all the Indians round to affift him and his few affociates. When the determinations of the Maffachufetts general court (occasioned, by what they called antinomian disputes) banished many and induced others to leave the colony, the heads of the party were entertained in a friendly manner by Mr. Williams; [1638.] who advised them to seek a settlement on Rhode-Island, and was very instrumental in procuring it of the Indian Sachems.

They, to the number of eighteen, incorporated themselves, and began settling the island. The plantations there and at Providence increased apace, owing to the liberal sentiments of the stiff settlers; and in 1643 Mr. Williams went to England as agent, and obtained [March 16, 1644] " a free and absolute charter of incorporation of Providence and Rhode-Island Plantations, empowering them to rule themselves, by that form they might vofuntarily agree upon." They agreed upon a democratic. Mr. Williams justly claims the honor of having been the first legislator in the world, in its latter ages, who effectually provided for, and established, a free, full, and absolute liberty of conscience. This was the chief cause that united the inhabitants of Rhode-Island and those of Providence, and made them one people, and one colony. The foundation principle on which this colony was first settled, was, that " every man who submits peaceably to the civil authority, may peaceably worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, without molestation." When the colony was applied to in 1656 by the four United Colonies " to join them in taking effectual methods to suppress the quakers, and prevent their pernicious dostrines being propagated in the country;" the affembly returned for answer "We shall strictly adhere to the foundation principle on which this colony was first fettled."

[July 8, 1663.] King Charles II. granted an ample charter, whereby the colony was made a body corporate and politic, by the name of the Governor and Company of the English Colony of Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations, in New-England, in America. The charter referved only allegiance to the king, without the smallest share of the legislative or executive powers.

[1685.] A writ of quo warranto was iffued out against the colony, which was brought June 26, 1686. The affembly determined not to fland fuit. After the revolution, they were allowed by government to refume their charter, no judgment having been given against it.

New-Hamoshire and the Main were settled about the same time with the Massachusetts, by different proprietors who had obtained patents; and whose views were to enrich themselves, by the sistling trade at sea, and the beaver trade ashore. Religion had little concern in the settlements: but it had some in the plantation of Exeter, on the river Pascataqua; which was began by Mr. Wheelright (a minister banished from the Massachusetts, on account of the antinomian dissensions with which the colony was convulsed,) and by a number of his adherents. They formed themselves into a body politic. Three other dissinct governments were also established on the branches of the said river. These governments, being altogether voluntary, had no security as to their continuance; and the several settlers were too divided in opinion to form any good general plan of permanent administration. Therefore the more considerate among them treated with the Massachusetts, about taking them under its protection; which fully fuited the wishes of that colony, as it afforded the heads of it the opportunity of realizing the construction they had put upon a clause of their charter, by which they extended their line, so as to comprehend both New-Hampshire and the Main. The business terminated in the incorporation of the two colonies, on condition that the inhabitants of each should enjoy equal privileges. They continued long united, and were of one heart and mind in civil and religious affairs*. When separated by the king's commission for the government of New-Hampshire, the new affembly at their first meeting, in a letter of March 25, 1680, to the governor of the Massachusetts, to be communicated to the general court, expressed their full satisfaction in the past connection; grateful fense of the care that had been exercised over them; and of their having been well governed; and an unfeigned defire, that a mutual correspondence between them might be fettled †.

The towns in the province of Main, after a time, fell into a state of confusion. The Maffachufetts took that opportunity, for encouraging the disposition which prevailed in many of the inhabitants to submit to their jurisdiction; and, to forward their compliance, granted the people larger privileges than were enjoved by their own; for they were all freemen upon taking the oath, whereas every where elfe no one could be made free, unless he was a church member. The province was made a county, by the name of Yorkflure: and the towns fent representatives to the general court at Boston. Though the major part of the inhabitants were brought to consent to this regulation, great opposition was made by some principal persons, who severely reproached the Massachusetts, for using force in order to reduce the province: but the people experienced the benefit of it, and were contented. They continued in union with the Maffachufetts until 1665, when a short separation commenced.

You have now a sketch of the settlement of all New-England. It would have been far more concise, had it not been necessary, to correct the mistakes frequently committed, by those who publish on the subject; and to remove the reproaches cast upon the bulk of the inhabitants, on acount of their religious profession. Whether there was any material difference between them and the other colonies, in regard to the opinion they entertained of their civil rights, you will be able to observe in the course of your reading. Their judgment in respect to the exercise of parliamentary powers over them, may be further known by what Randolph wrote concerning the Massachusetts, in his narrative and letters, after the restoration; from whence "it seems to have been a general opinion that acts of parliament had no other force, than what they derived from acts passed by the general court to establish or confirm them."

[1676.] Randolph declared, "No law is in force or esteem there, but fuch as are made by the general court; and therefore it is accounted a breach of their privileges, and a betraying the liberties of the commonwealth to urge the observation of the laws of England."-" No oath shall be urged, or required to be taken by any person, but such oath as the general court hath confidered, allowed, and required."-" There is no notice taken of the act of navigation, plantation, or any other laws made in England for the regulation of trade."-" All nations have free liberty to come into their ports, and vend their commodities without any reftraint; in this as well as in other things, that government would make the world believe they are a free state, and do act in all matters accordingly."-" The magistrates have continually disobeyed his majesty's command in his royal letters of 1662, 64, 65, and those of March last; ever reserving to themselves a power to alter, evade and disannul any law or command not agreeing with their humour, or the absolute authority of their government," acknowledging no fuperior."-" He (the governor) freely declared to me, that the laws made by your majesty and your parliament obligeth them in nothing, but what confifts with the interest of the colony; that the legislative power is and abides in them folely *."

The Mosfachusetts general court, in a letter to their agents, mentioned, that not being represented in parliament, they looked not upon themselves to be impeded in their trade by the acts of trade and navigation, and that these could not be observed by his majesty's subjects in Massachusetts without invading their hiberties and properties, until the general court made provision therein by a law, which they did in October. Notwithstanding such law, and a subsequent order, Feb. 15, 1681, "that the act of navigation and the act for the encouragement of trade, be published in Boston by beat of drum, and all clauses in said acts relating to the plantation be strictly observed," Randolph complained to the commissioners of the customs in England, because of their not being duly observed. When the people found themselves in danger of a quo warranto, they agreed upon such emendations of their acts of trade, as to make them accord in all things with the laws of England. But it was too late. A quo warranto was fent them, and brought by Randolph, Nov. 3, 1683; and the next year a writ of fiire facias was profecuted in the court of chancery against the governor and company, and judgment given, that the charter should be annihilated. Considering the temper of Charles II. it is rather matter of astonishment, that the sentiments and conduct of the Massachusetts government did not provoke him to vacate the charter much sooner. However mortifying, yet it would have been more prudent, to have declined contending with the king, when they knew that they must be vanqished, than virtually to bid him defiance. Such submission might not have saved them from the arbitrary government that followed, but could have been of no differvice, had there not been a subsequent revolution: that event taking place, it would have been extremely beneficial. They might have been allowed to resume their charter, nearly, if not wholly, Before we proceed to the fouthward, let it be noted, that in 1672, the English parliament enacted by law, "That if any veffel, which by law may trade in the plantations, shall take on board any enumerated commodities, and a bond shall not have been given with fufficient fecurity to unlade them in England, there shall be rendered to his majesty, for sugars, tobacco, ginger, cocoa nut, indigo, logwood, fustic, cotton wool, the several duties mentioned in the law, to be paid in fuch places in the plantations, and to fuch officers as shall be appointed to collect the fame: and for their better collection, it is enacted, that the whole business shall be managed, and the imposts be levied by officers appointed by the commissioners of the customs in England." This is the first act that imposed customs on the colonies alone, to be regularly collected by colonial revenue officers. But the best affected colonies, Barbadoes, Virginia and Maryland, confidering the laws of trade either as inconfistent with their privileges, or destructive of their infant commerce, hesitated to obey, or elude the provisions of the laws; and trafficked without restraint, wherever hope of gain directed their navigators. Charles II. reprimanded them, and his fucceffors gave Randing instructions upon the head, but without effect *.

Governor Nicholfon of Maryland wrote to the board of trade, August 16, 1698, "I have observed that a great many people in all these provinces and colonies, especially in those under proprietaries, and the two others under Connesticut and Rhode-Island, think that no law of England ought to be in force and binding to them without their own consent; for they foolishly say, they have no representatives sent from themselves to the parliament of England; and they look upon all laws made in England, that put any restraint upon them, to be great hardships." These were the colonial sentiments two years after passing the famous declaratory act of William and Mary, which you will find mentioned below. Molyneux's Case of Ireland, afferting openly the same doctrines, was first published in Fe-

The colony of New-York demands our next attention. The Dutch had fettled, and named it the New Netherlands. Charles II. refolved upon its conquest in 1664, and in March granted to his brother the duke of York, the region extending from the western banks of Connecticut to the eastern shore of the Delaware, together with Long-Island, conferring on him the civil and military powers of government. Colonel Nichols was sent with four frigates and three hundred soldiers to effect the business. The Dutch governor being unable to make resistance, the New Netherlands submitted to the English crown, in September, without any other change than of rulers. Few of the Dutch removed: and Nichols instantly entered upon the exercise of his power, as deputy governor of the duke of York, the proprietary.

In July, 1673, the Dutch repossessed themselves of the province, by attacking it suddenly when in a defenceless state. By the peace in February following it was restored. The validity of the grant, while the Dutch were in quiet possession having been questioned, the duke of York thought it prudent to obtain a new one the following June; and Edmund Andros having been appointed governor, the Dutch resigned their authority to him in October. Thus was New-York regained: but the inhabitants were again enslaved to the will of the conqueror; for, being admitted to no share in the legislature, they were subject to laws, to which they had never affented.

[1681.] To be relieved from a fervitude that had degraded the colony, and now gave diffatisfaction to every one, the council, the court of affizes, and the corporation of New-York, concurred in foliciting the duke, "to permit the people to participate in the legislative power." The duke, though strongly prejudiced against democratic affemblies, yet in expectation that the inhabitants would agree to raise money to discharge the public debts, and to settle such a fund for the suture as might be sufficient for the maintenance of the government and garrison, informed the lieutenant-governor, in 1682, that "he intended to establish the same frame of government as the other plantations enjoyed, particularly in the choosing of an affembly."

Mr. Dongan was appointed governor in September, and inflructed to call an affembly, to confift of a council of ten, and of a house of representatives, chosen by the freeholders, of the number of eighteen members. The affembly was empowered to make laws for the people, agreeable to the general jurisprudence of the state of England, which should be of no force, however, without the ratification of the proprietary. "Thus the inhabitants of New-York, after being ruled almost twenty years at the will of the duke's deputies, were first admitted to participate in the legislative power."

[1683.] An affembly was called on governor Dongan's arrival, which passed an act of general naturalization, in order to give equal privileges to the various kinds of people then inhabiting the province: together with an act "declaring the liberties of the people;" as also one "for defraying the requisite charges of government for a limited time." The legislature was convened once more in August, 1684, when it explained the last act. These seem to have been the only affemblies called prior to the revolution.

When the duke became king of England, he refused to confirm that grant of privileges to which as duke he had agreed. He established a real tyranny, and reduced New-York once more to the deplorable condition of a conquered province.

New- Ferfey, which was also taken from the Dutch (who were confidered as having no right to any of their fettlements in thefe parts of America) was included in the grant to the duke of York. The duke disposed of it to Lord Berkely and Sir George Carteret; who, being sole proprietors, for the better settlement of it, agreed [1664.] upon certain constitutions of government, so well relished, that the eastern parts were foon confiderably peopled. One of the stipulations was, " no qualified person, at any time, shall be any ways molested, punished, disquieted, or called into question, for any difference in opinion or practice in matters of religious concernments, who does not actually diflurb the civil peace of the province; but all and every fuch person and persons, may, from time to time, and at all times, freely and fully have and enjoy his and their judgments and confciences. in matters of religion, they behaving themselves peaceably and quietly, and not using this liberty to licentiousness, nor to the civil injury or outward diffurbance of others; any law, statute, or clause contained, or to be contained, usage or custom of the realm of England, to the contrary thereof in any wife notwith-flanding *." The lords proprietors further agreed, " for the better fecurity of all the inhabitants in the province—That they are not to impose, NOR SUFFER TO BE IMPOSED, any tax, custom, subsidy, tallage, assessment, or any other duty what soever, upon any colour or pretence, upon the said province and inhabitants thereof, other than what shall be imposed by the authority and consent of the general assembly *." What can more strongly express the then opinion of Lord Berkely and Sir George Carieret, as to the parliament's having no right to tax the inhabitants of the province, possessed by them as lords proprietors!

[1674.] Lord Berkely fold his moiety of the province to John Fenwick, in trust for Edward Byllinge and his affigns .-After which the proprietors, E. Byllinge, William Penn, Gawen Lawrie, Nicholas Lucas, and Edmond Warner, of the quaker persuasion, agreed with Sir George Carteret [1676.] upon a division; and that his moiety should be called New East- Fersey and theirs New West- Fersey. The agreement respecting the not imposing or suffering to be imposed any tax, &c, was adopted: the other stipulation is worded somewhat differently-"No men, nor number of men upon earth, hath power or authority to rule over men's consciences in religious matters; therefore it is confented, agreed and ordained, that no person or persons whatsoever, within the province, at any time or times hereafter, shall be any ways, upon any pretence whatfoever, called in question, or in the least punished or hurt, either in person, estate or privilege, for the fake of his opinion, judgment, faith or worship towards God in matters of religion; but that all and every fuch person and persons, may from time to time, and at all times, freely and fully have and enjoy his and their judgments, and the exercise of their consciences, in matters of religious worship, throughout all the province t." It was also agreed, "that all elections be not determined by the common and confused way of cries and voices; but by putting balls into balloting boxes, to be provided for that purpose, for the prevention of all partiality, and whereby every man may freely choose according to his own judgment and honest intention t."

Soon after, many quakers' reforted to West-Jersey from England, and the country filled apace. But the people early experienced the dreadful effects of arbitrary power. Major Andros the governor of New-York, imposed 10 per cent. on all goods imported at the Hoar-kills, and demanded 5 per cent. of the settlers at arrival or afterward, though neither West- Fersey, nor the Hour-kill, was legally under his jurisdiction. They complained of the hardship from the first, but bore it patiently, till about 1680, when application was made to the duke of York, who referred the matter to the council, where it rested for a considerable time, and then was reported in their favor, and the duty ordered to be discontinued. Among the arguments used by Messrs. William Penn, George Hutchinson and others, chiefly, if not all quakers, in the paper presented to the duke's commissioners, were these, "Powers of government are expressly granted, in the conveyance lord Berkelv made us; for that only could have induced us to buy it; and the reason is plain, because to all prudent men, the government of any place is more inviting than the foil; for what is good land without good laws; the better, the worfe. And if we could not affure people of an eafy and free, and fafe government, both with respect to their spiritual and worldly property, that is, an uninterrupted liberty of conscience, and an inviolable possession of their civil rights and freedoms, by a just and wife government, a mere wilderness would be no encouragement; for it were a madness to leave a free, good, and improved country, to plant in a wilderness, and there adventure many thousands of pounds, to give an absolute title to another person to tax us at will and pleafure." Natural right and human prudence oppose such doctrine all the world over, as fays, "that people, free by law under their prince at home, are at his mercy in the plantations abroad." The king's grant to the duke of York, is plainly restrictive to the laws and government of England. Now, we humbly conceive, it is made a fundamental in our conflitution and government, that the king of England cannot justly take his fubjects goods without their confent: this needs no more to be proved than a principle; 'tis jus indigene, an home-born right, declared to be law by divers flatutes; as in the great charter, ch. 29, and 24. Ed. III. ch. 2; again 25 Ed. ch. 7*. To give up the power of making laws is to change the government, to fell or rather relign ourselves to the will of another; and that for nothing: for we buy nothing of the duke, if not the right of an undisturbed colonizing, with no diminution, but expectation of some increase of those freedoms and privileges enjoyed in our own country. We humbly fay, that we have not lost any part of our liberty, by leaving our country; but we transplant to a place, with express limitation to erect no polity contrary to the established government (of England), but as near as may be to it; and this variation is allowed, but for the fake of emergencies: and that latitude bounded with these words, for the good of the adventurer and planter. This tax is not to be found in the duke's conveyances, but is an after business. Had the planters foreseen it, they would sooner have taken up in any other plantation in America-[a plain intimation that no fuch tax was imposed in any other American plantation.] Beside, there is no end of this power; for fince we are by this precedent affeffed without any law, and thereby excluded our English right of common affent to taxes; what fecurity have we of any thing we poffefs? We can call nothing our own, but are tenants at will. not only for the foil, but for all our personal estates; we endure penury, and the fweat of our brows, to improve them at our own hazard only. This is to transplant from good to bad. This fort of conduct has destroyed government, but never raised one to any true greatness "."

The paper presented to the duke's commissioners, evidently proves, that it was the opinion of these gentlemen, who were quakers, that no tax could be justly imposed upon the inhabitants, without their own confent first had, and by the authority of their own general affembly. The report of the council in favour of the aggrieved, and the relief that followed, were virtual conceffions to the fame purport. This will not be judged wholly unprecedented by those who are acquainted with what happened relative to the county-palatine and city of Chefter, in the 35th year of the reign of Henry VIII. [1543.] The inhabitants complained in a petition to the king, that for want of knights and burgesses in the court of parliament, they sustained manifold damages, not only in their lands, goods and bodies, but in the civil and politic governance and maintenance of the commonwealth of their faid county; and that while they had been always bound by the acts and statutes of the said court of parliament, the fame as other counties, cities and boroughs, that had knights and burgefles in faid court, they had often been touched and grieved with acts and flatutes made within the faid court, as well derogatory unto the most ancient jurisdictions, liberties and privileges of the faid county-palatine, as prejudicial unto the commonwealth, quietness and peace of his majesty's subjects. They proposed to the king, as a remedy, that it would please his highness, that it be enacted, with the affent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and by the commons in parliament affembled, that from the end of the fession, the county-palatine shall have two knights for the faid county, and likewife two citizens to be burgeffes for the city of Chefter. The complaint and remedy were thought to be so just and reasonable, that the relief for which they prayed was granted, and they were admitted to fend representatives to parliament, to guard their interests and to secure their liberties and privileges.

The reasons for my passing from the Jerseys to Virginia will foon be obvious.

Virginia was the original name for all the English North-American continental claims, given in honor to the virgin queen, Elizabeth. King James, being applied to, granted letters patent to a body of gentlemen on the 6th of April, 1606, with powers to divide themselves into two distinct companies, the one confisting of London adventurers, called the first or fouthern colony of Virginia; the second or northern colony, composed of merchants belonging to Bristol, Plymouth, and Exeter. The territory granted to the first or southern colony, was generally called Virginia, without any distinguishing epithet; and retained that name after the second or northern colony obtained the name of New-England, in 1614.

The London company applied their attention immediately to the forming of a fettlement, and fent off a hundred and ten emigrants, who arrived on the coast of Virginia, April 29th, 1607: a party landed on the promontory, called, in honor of the prince of Wales, Cape Henry; afterward proceeded to and took possession of a peninsula in James-river, and began a settlement at James-town. The instructions given by the company of proprietors, when they sent out their second supply the following year, show that the most active projectors in England had for their chief objects discovery and gain, rather than colonization.

[1609.] A new charter was obtained: many of the first nobility and gentry were added to the former proprietors, and were incorporated by the name of "The Treasurer and Company of Adventurers, of the city of London, for the first colony of Virginia." To them was granted in absolute property the lands extending from Cape Comfort along the fea-coast fouthward 200 miles, from the fame promontory 200 miles northward, and from the Atlantic westward to the South-sea. The company was empowered to make ordinances for the colony, and for those on the feas going thither. There was granted to the treasurer and company and their assigns, a freedom from all subsidies in Virginia for 21 years, and from all impositions on importations and exportations to and from England, or any other of the king's dominions, "except only the five pounds in the hundred due for cultoms." Little was conceded to the emigrants by the char-Vot. I.

ter; and much conferred on the corporation. The colonists were to be governed by the ordinances of a corporation residing in England, in which they were not represented, and over the deliberations of which they had no control. The powers of the corporation were indeed controlable, as it was subject to the superintendence of the courts of justice within the realm, which could compel it to act agreeable as well to the grant, as to the laws of the slate.

The adventurers, warmed with golden dreams of great riches, foon fitted out nine fnips, with 500 emigrants, and every neceffary for the establishment of a permanent colony, excepting suitable encouragement to the settlers. Lord Delaware was appointed captain-general for life. Only seven vessels arrived sate.

When Mr. Smith, who had governed the colony, departed for England, he left behind him 500 perfons, of whom, what with bad management, diffensions, attacks from the Indians, waste of provisions, which occasioned a famine, &c. there remained only fixty of all ages and fexes, at the expiration of fix months. When Sir Thomas Gates, the lieutenant-governor arrived in May, 1610. and faw the calamitous fituation of affairs, he concluded on embarking the colonists and failing for England: but before he could proceed to fea, Lord Delaware arrived with three ships, bringing abundant supplies, and carried back with him to Jamestown the feeble remains of the colony. He foon re-established matters; but his health obliging him, he failed for England the beginning of the subsequent year, [1611.] leaving about 200 colonists, possessed of health, plenty, and peace with their neighbours. After his departure they relapfed; but his successor, Sir Thomas Dale, arriving in May with more emigrants, cattle, and provision for a year, things were again restored. This same year the adventurers obtained a new charter, by which the two former were confirmed, and they had also granted to them all the islands situated in the ocean, within 300 leagues of any part of the Virginia coast. The corporation was now considerably new modelled, and, in order to promote the effectual fettlement of the plantation. licence was given to open lotteries in any part of England. The lotteries alone, which were the first ever granted in England, brought 29,000 l, into the company's treasury. length, being confidered as a national evil, they attracted the notice of parliament, were prefented by the commons as a grievance, and in March, 1620, fulpended by an order of council.

Sir Thomas Gates was dispatched with fix large ships, carrying 300 colonists, 100 cattle, and useful supplies. He arrived in August: and parties were sent out from James-town to form distant settlements. He returned the beginning of 1614, and the administration devolved once more on Sir Thomas Dale, to whom the Virginians owe the introduction of landed property. In 1615, fifty acres of land were granted to every emigrant and his heirs, and the fame quantity to every person imported by others. Dale failed for England in the beginning of 1616, giving up the trust to Sir George Yeardley, as deputy governor, and in this year the cultivation of tobacco was introduced. It was originally carried from Tobago to England. Mr. Argal, a new deputy, arrived in May, 1617. He published a variety of edicts, and was guilty of those wrongs and oppressions, that the treasurer and council appointed Yeardley captain-general, and empowered him to examine into and redrefs grievances. Sir George arrived April, 1619, bringing with him feveral instructions favorable to freedom, and foon declared his intention of calling a general affembly, which gave the greatest joy to men, who had been hitherto subjected to the arbitrary orders of their prince, to the interested ordinances of an English corporation, or to the edicts of a haughty governor; and who enjoyed none of those liberties

administration

In June, Yeardley, pursuant to his instructions from the company, iffued writs for the election of delegates, called burgeffes. The colony had been divided into feven hundreds or distinct fettlements, which seemed to enjoy some of the privileges of boroughs; and from this circumstance the democratic branch of the affembly has been called to this day the house of burgeffes, though composed almost entirely of the representatives of counties. The affembly, formed of the governor and council of flate, who were appointed by the treasurer and company, and of the burgeffes chosen by the people, met together in one apartment, and transacted affairs like the parliament of Scotland of old, which mode continued till after the reftoration of Charles H. Thus convened, and thus composed, the legislature "debated all matters thought expedient for the good of the whole." The laws were transmitted to England, for the approbation of the treafurer and company, without whose confirmation they were of no validity. The introduction of an affembly was attended with the happiest effects. The emigrants, for the first time, resolved to settle themselves, and to perpetuate the plantation. The affembly thanked the company for their favor, and begged them "to reduce into a compendious form, with his majesty's approbation, the laws of England proper for Vinginia, with fuitable additions;" giving as a reason, "that it was not fit that his subjects should be governed by any other rules, than fuch as received their influence from him." This year the treasurer and council received a letter, "commanding them to fend a hundred dissolute persons (consider) to Virginia." They were accordingly transported; and were at that period very acceptable to the colonies," though the unlimited practice of emptying the English jails on the American continent has of late years been complained of as a nuisance. [1602.] The subfequent year must, on account of the introduction of African flaves into the colonies, be stigmatized as a much viler æra.—The Hollanders were not then precluded by any law from trading with the colonies. A Dutch vessel carried to Virginia a cargo of negroes, and the Virginians, who had themselves just emerged from a state of slavery, became chargeable with reducing their fellow men to the condition of brutes.

[1621.] In July, the treasurer and company carried into execution a resolution formerly taken, for establishing a proper conflitution for the colony. The ordinance they passed, declared that there should be two supreme councils in Virginia, the one to be called the council of state, to be appointed and displaced by the treasurer and company, and which was to advise the governor in governmental affairs; the other was to be denominated the general affembly, and to confift of the governor and council, and of two burgeffes, to be chosen, for the present, by the inhabitants of every town, hundred, and fettlement in the colony. The affembly was to determine by the majority of the voices then prefent, and to enact general laws for the colony, referving to the governor a negative voice. They were to imitate the laws and customs, and judicial proceedings used in England. "No acts were to be in force till confirmed by the general court in England: on the other hand, no order of the general court was to bind the colony, till affented to by the affembly." The company having offered territory to those who should either emigrate themselves, or engage to transport people to the colony, found this policy fo fuccelsful, that upward of 3500 persons emigrated to Virginia during this and the two preceding years.

This year was remarkable for a maffacre of the colonifts by the Indians, which was executed with the utmost subtilty, and without any regard to age, sex, or dignity. A well concerted attack on all the settlements, destroyed, in one hour, and almost at the same inflant, 347 persons, who were defenceless and incapable of making resistance. The emigrants, not withstanding the orders they had received, had never been solicitous to cultivate the good-will of the natives, and had neither asked permission when they occupied their country, nor given a price for their valuable property, which was violently taken away. The miseries of samine were soon superadded to the horrors of massacre. Of eighty plantations, which were filling apace, only eight remained; and of the numbers which had been transported thither, no more than about 1800 survived those manifold disasters.

Frequent complaints having been made to king James of the oppressions of the treasurer and company, and the before-mentioned calamities being attributed to their misconduct or neglect, it was determined that a commission should issue to enquire into the affairs of Virginia and the Somer-isles, from the earliest settlement of each. Upon the report of the commisfioners, the king concluded on giving a new charter, and required of the company the furrender of former grants, which, being refused, a writ of quo warranto issued in November, 1623, against the patents of the corporation: and judgment was given by the court of King's-bench against the treasurer and company, in Trinity-term, 1624. These proceedings "were so conformable to the general strain of the arbitrary administration of that reign, that they made little impression at the time, though the Virginia company was composed of persons of the first quality, wealth, and confequence in the nation." The company probably would not have exercised so tame and submissive a spirit, had they not been wholly disappointed in their visionary profpects, and met with confiderable losses, instead of acquiring enormous profits. They had obtained from individuals, who fported in their lotteries from the hope of fudden riches, £.29,000: but the transportation of more than 9000 English subjects had cost them £.150,000. They did not however abandon the colony in its diffrefs, while they continued a corporation. Timely supplies were fent from England to the Virginia fettlers, which fo animated them, that they carried on an offensive war against the Indians, pursued them into their fastnesses, and drove them from the neighbourhood of those rivers, where they had fixed their own plantations.

As to king James, he "affuredly confidered the colonies as acquired by conquest; and that they ought to be holden of his person, independent of his crown or political capacity; and might be ruled according to his good will, by prerogative: and he endeavoured, agreeable to the strange economy of his reign, to convert them into a mere private estate, descendable to his perfonal heirs *."

The Virginia company being dissolved, James took the colony under his immediate dependence, which occasioned much confusion. Upon his death, king Charles, [1625.] being of the fame judgment with his father as to the government of Virginia, determined to tread in the fame fleps. In May he named a new governor and council for Virginia, and invested them with an authority fully legislative and arbitrary. They were empowered to make and execute laws, to impose taxes, and enforce pay-Neither the commission nor instructions mentioned expressly, or even alluded to an affembly, to the laws of England, or to the acts of the provincial legislature, as a rule of govern-They were required to transport colonists into England, to be punished there for crimes committed in Virginia. This fystem encreased the colonial diffatisfaction, which continued for years, till the Virginians received a letter containing the royal affurance, that "all their estates, trade, freedom, and privileges, should be enjoyed by them in as extensive a manner. as they enjoyed them before the recalling of the company's patent." On this they were reconciled, and began again to

Being left for some years in a manner to themselves, they increafed beyond expectation. They remained under the administration of their late governors, and other officers, who respected their privileges because they loved the colony. The governor, whom Charles had been anxious to appoint, had no opportunity of exercifing those illegal and extraordinary powers with which he had been invested. His death in 1627 put an end to his authority, and prevented the colony's feeling its full extent. His fuccessor John Harvey, .efg; was nominated in March 1629; and his commission and instructions were precisely the same with those of the former. He departed foon after for Virginia. The spirit of his administration was an exact counterpart of what had too long prevailed in England. He was fevere in his extortions, proud in his councils, unjust and arbitrary in every department of his government. The Virginians, roused almost to madness by oppression, seized and sent him prisoner to England, accompanied with two deputies, to reprefent their grievances and his misconduct. His behaviour was fo thought of, that he was honored with a new commission which confirmed former powers, and he was fent back to Virginia in April 1637. After that, his government was fo excessively oppressive and cruel, that the complaints of the colonists became at length too loud to be longer neglected, and his commission was revoked in January, 1638-9, During his ten years administration, the Virginians were ruled rather as the vaifals of an eastern despot, than as subjects entitled to English liberties; but it is to their credit, that, having tasted the fweets of a fimple government, they opposed with a firm spirit, during the reign of Charles, the attempts of those who endeayoured to revive the patents, and to restore the corporation.

Sir William Berkely was appointed governor the beginning of 1639. His inflructions evidenced a prodigious change in colonial policy, which must be partly ascribed to the then state of affairs in England. He was directed to summon all the burgesses of the plantations, who with the governor and council were to constitute the grand assembly, with power to make acts for the government of the colony, as near as might be to the laws of England—to cause speedy justice to be administered to all, according to English forms—and to forbid all trade with foreign vessels except upon necessity. Thus were the Viginians restored to that suffer of freedom, which they had derived from the Virginia company, and which the writ of quo warranto had involved in the same ruin with the corporation itself.

Civil diffensions however took place, which were imbittered by religious differences, and inflamed by acts made to prohibit the preaching of the doctrines of the puritans. The difcontented party presented a petition to the house of commons, in the name of the affembly, " praying for the restoration of the ancient patents and corporation government." But the governor. council, and burgeifes, no fooner heard of the transaction, than they transmitted an explicit disavowal of it. They sent also an address to king Charles, acknowledging his bounty and favor toward them, and earnefly defiring to continue under his immediate protection. In 1642, they declared in the form of an act. "that they were born under monarchy, and would never degenerate from the condition of their births, by being subject to any other government." Nothing could be more acceptable than this act, which being prefented to the king at York, drew from him an answer, in which he gave them the fullest assurances, that they should be always immediately dependent upon the crown, and that the form of government should never be changed.

They remained unalterably attached to the cause of their so-vereign. But when the Commons of England had triumphed over their European opponents, their attention was turned to the plantations; and an ordinance was passed in October 1650, "for prohibiting trade with Barbadoes, Virginia, Bermuda, and Antego." It recited, that "in Virginia, and other places in America, there are colonies, which were planted at the cost, and settled by the people, and by the authority of this nation, which ought to be subordinate to, and dependent upon England—that they ever have been, and ought to be subject to such laws and regulations as are, or shall be made by the parliament—that divers acts of rebellion have been committed by many persons in-

habiting Virginia, whereby they have fet up themselves in opposition to this commonwealth." It therefore declared them "notorious robbers and traitors." Persons in power generally reason alike against those who oppose their authority, and dispute the legality or equity of their measures, whatever might be their own fentiments when in a lower station, and while aggrieved by superiors. The ordinance authorized the council of state to fend a fleet thither, and to grant commissions to proper perfons to enforce to obedience all fuch as flood opposed to the authority of parliament. In confequence hereof commissioners were appointed, and a powerful fleet and army detached, to reduce all their enemies to submission. They were to use their endeavours, by granting pardons and by other peaceful arts, to induce the colonists to obey the state of England: but, if these means should prove ineffectual, then they were to employ every act of hostility; to free those fervants and flaves of masters oppening the government, that would ferve as foldiers to fubdue them; and to cause the acts of parliament to be executed, and justice to be administered, in the name of the commonwealth. After the arrival of the commissioners with the naval and military force, the Virginians refused to submit, till articles of surrender had been agreed upon, by which it was stipulated, "The plantation of Virginia, and all the inhabitants thereof, shall enjoy fuch freedoms and privileges as belong to the free people of England. The general affembly, as formerly, shall convene and transact the affairs of the colony. The people of Virginia shall have a free trade, as the people of England, to all places, and with all nations. Virginia shall be free from all taxes, customs, and impositions whatsoever; and none shall be imposed on them without confent of the general affembly; and neither forts nor castles shall be erected, nor garrisons maintained without their consent *."

The hardships the Virginians experienced from restrictions on their trade under Oliver Cromwell, together with their attachment to the royal family, induced them to seize the occasion of the death of the protector's governor, for applying to Sir William Berkely, who had lived privately during the revolutions of the day, to resume the government of the colony, to which he confented, on their solemnly promising to venture their lives and fortunes with him for Charles II. Before they had heard of the death of Cromwell, Charles was proclaimed by them king of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Virginia. During the distresses to which the royalists were exposed in England prior to this event, they reforted to that colony, so that Virginia contained about 30,000 persons at the restoration. Sir William Berkely, in his answer to the inquiries of the lords of the committee of the colonies writes, June 20, 1671, "there are 40,000 persons, men, women, and children, 2000 black slaves, and 6000 christian servants for a short time." You will not have your good opinion of him heightened for his adding—"I thank God there are no free schools, nor printing, and I hope we shall not have them these hundred years. For learning has brought disobedience, and herefy, and seets into the world, and printing has divulged them and libels against the government. God keep us from both *!"

You will remark, that, however zealous the Virginians were to honor the Charles's with their loyalty, they boldly declined complimenting king, commonwealth, and protector with their liberties.

Maryland comes now to be confidered.

Sir George Calvert was one of the original affociates in the great Virginia company, and continued a member of that corporation during its existence: and, as secretary of state, he acted as one of the committee of council for the affairs of the plantations while James I. lived. Sir George, in his reign, having thought proper to alter his religious sentiments and embrace popery, ingenuously avowed the change. The king, pleased with his sincerity, granted him a part of Newfoundland, which the French at length obliged him to abandon. His majesty further testified his regard, by creating him lord Bakimore of Ireland. King Charles, to compensate for his loss of the Newfoundland territory, gave him a grant of the country on the north side of the Chesapeak-bay.

His lordship died April 15, 1632, before the patent was made out; on which his fon Cecil took it out in his own name the June following. Charles, in honor to his royal confort Henrietta Maria, named the colony Maryland; and, being desirous of gratifying the proprietary all in his power, invested him with as much sovereignty as could well consist with an immediate subjection to the crown of England. His lordship, with the affent of the freemen, or their delegates, whom he was required to assemble for that purpose, might make laws of what kind soever for the province, so that they were not repugnant, but agreeable to the jurisprudence and rights of the realm of England; and he was authorised to execute the acts of the alsembly. There was no clause in the charter obliging him to transmit their acts to the king for approbation or diffent: nor any faving of the royal interference in the government of the colony. Charles referved to himfelf, and his heirs for ever, imposts, duties, and customs, which the colonists were bound to pay; but declared in the same charter, "We, our heirs and successors, shall at no time set and make, or cause to be set, any imposition, custom, or taxation, on the inhabitants of the province, for their lands, goods, tenements, or chattels, within the said province." By this clause the king covenanted for himself, heirs, and successors, that, having reserved for ever the imposts, duties, and customs, he would not contribute toward setting upon the inhabitants any imposition, custom, or taxation, for their lands, goods, tenements, or chattels, within the said province; and therein bound both himself and them, not to assent a supposition to the inhabitants.

The first emigration consisted of two hundred gentlemen of confiderable fortune and rank, with their adherents, chiefly Roman Catholics, who hoped to enjoy liberty of conscience, under a proprietary of their own profession. They failed from England in November, and landed in Maryland the beginning of 1633. Governor Calvert, brother to lord Baltimore, very wifely and justly purchased, by presents of various goods, the rights of the Indians, and with their free confent took poffession of their town, which he called St. Mary's. The country was fettled with fo much eafe, and furnished with fo many conveniences, that emigrants repaired thither in fuch numbers, that the colony foon became populous and flourishing. A third affembly of freemen was held at St. John's in February, 1638-9, when an act was passed, "for establishing the house of assembly." It enacted, that those who shall be elected pursuant to writs iffued, shall be called burgesses, and shall supply the place of the freemen who chose them—that the gentlemen fummoned by the special writ of the proprietary, and those freemen who shall not have voted at any of the elections, together with the governor and fecretary, shall be called "the house of assembly"-that all acts affented to by that body, shall be deemed of the same force, as if the proprietary and freemen had been personally present. Slavery feems to have gained an early establishment in Maryland, for an act of this affembly describes "the people" to confist of all christian inhabitants, "tlaves only excepted." The perfecuting laws which were paffed by the Virginians, foon after this period, against the puritans, made the latter emigrate in considerable numbers to Maryland, that they might enjoy, under a popish proprietary, that liberty of conscience, of which they were deprived by fellow protestants. In

In 1642 the burgesses "desired that they might be separated, and sit by themselves, and have a negative"—such was their progress in entertaining just conceptions of their own democratic rights. The governor did not grant their request; but they were afterward more successful. The assembly of 1649 was assuredly divided into two parts, and transacted business in the form of an upper and lower house. That assembly which convened in April enacted, that no persons professing to believe in Jesus Christ shall be molested in respect of their religion, or in the exercise thereof, or be compelled to the belief or exercise of any other religion against their consent, so that they be not unfaithful to the proprietary, or conspire against the civil government—that those reproaching any with opprobrious names of religious distinction, shall forfeit ten shillings to the persons injured—that any one speaking reproachfully against the blessed virgin, or the apostles, shall forfeit five pounds—but blasphemy against God shall be punished with death.

In 1650 a law was passed "for settling this present assembly." It enacted, that those who were called by special writ shall form the upper house—that those who were chosen by the hundreds shall compose the lower house—and that all bills which shall be affented to by the two branches of the legislature thus established, and affented to by the governor, shall be deemed the laws of the province, and have the same effect as if the freemen were personally present. There was also passed "an act against raifing money without the confent of the affembly." It mentioned, "That no taxes shall be affessed or levied on the freemen of the province without their own confent, or that of their deputies, first declared in a general assembly. The printed words and early date of this Maryland act demand particular notice, The acts of the general affembly and governor were of the fame force in their own province, as acts of parliament in England; and could not be repealed without the concurring affent of the proprietary, or his deputy, with the other two estates. Carolina follows Maryland in the order of existence.

A few adventurers emigrated from the Maffachufetts, and fettled round Cape Fear, about the time of the refloration.— They confidered mere occupancy, with a transfer from the natives, without any grant from the king, as a good title to the lands which they poffessed. They deemed themselves entitled to the same "civil privileges" as those of the country from whence they had emigrated. For years they experienced the complicated miseries of want. They solicited the aid of their countrymen: and the general court, with an attention and humanity which did it the greatest honor, ordered an extensive contribution on for their relief. But the final fettlement of the province was effected equally through the rapacity of the courtiers of Charles the II. and his own facility in rewarding those, to whom he was greatly indebted, with a liberality that cost him little. The pretence, which had been used on former occasions, of a pious zeal for the propagation of the gospel among the Indians, was fuccessfully employed to procure a grant of the immense region, lying between the 36° of north latitude, and the river St. Matheo under the 31°. March 24, 1663, this territory was erected into a province by the name of Carolina; and conferred on Lord Clarendon, the Duke of Albemarle, Lord Craven, Lord Berkely, Lord Ashley, Sir George Carteret, Sir John Colleton, and Sir William Berkely, as absolute lords proprietaries for ever, faving the fovereign allegiance due to the crown. The charter feems to have been copied from that of Maryland, fo extensive in its powers, and so noble in its privileges. The noblemen held their first meeting in May; and, at the defire of the New-England people above-mentioned, published proposals to all that would plant in Carolina. They declared, that all persons settling on Charlesriver, to the fouthward of Cape Fear, should have power to fortify its banks, taking the oath of allegiance to the king, and fubmitting to the government of the proprietaries—that the emigrants might prefent to them thirteen persons, in order that they might appoint a governor and a council of fix for three yearsthat an affembly, composed of the governor, the council, and delegates of the freemen, should be called as soon as circumstances would allow, with power to make laws, not contrary to those of England, nor of any validity after the publication of the diffent of the proprietaries—that every one should enjoy the most perfect freedom in religion—that during five years, every freeman should be allowed one hundred acres of land, and fifty for every fervant, paying only an half-penny an acre-and that the same freedom from customs, which had been confirmed by the royal charter, should be allowed to every one.

The proprietaries appointed Sir William Berkely, then governor of Virginia, general superintendent of the affairs of the county of Albemarle, within the boundaries of which, a fmall plantation, of the New-Englanders probably, had been chablished for some years, on the north eaflern shores of the river Chowan. Sir William Berkely repaired to the county, confirmed and granted lands on the conditions before-mentioned, appointed Mr. Drummond the first governor, and likewise other officers,

The affembly of 1666, being diffatisfied with the tenures by which they held their lands, petitioned the proprietaries, that the people of Albemarle might hold their possessions on the fame terms on which the Virginians enjoyed theirs, and were gratified.

[1665.] The proprietaries appionted John Yeamans, a refpectable planter of Barbadoes, commander in chief of Clarendon county, firetching from Cape Fear to the river St. Matheo; and he was at the fame time created a baronet. To fecure its profperity, the fame powers were conferred, and the fame conflitution established, as those which had made Albemarle happy.

A fettlement was also now projected to the fouthward of Cape Romain, which acquired the name of Carteret. Thus a variety of separate and independent colonies, each of which had its own government, its own affembly, its own customs and laws, were established in Carolina.

In June 1665, the proprietaries obtained a fecond charter which recited and confirmed the former. They were enabled to make laws for the province, with the confent of the freemen or their delegates: and likewife to grant titles of honor by creation of a nobility. No one prerogative of the crown was referred.

Samuel Stevens, ely; was appointed governor of Albemarle in October, 1667, and was commanded to act agreeable to the advice of a council of twelve, the one half of which he was to appoint, the other was to be chosen by the affembly. The affembly was to be composed of the governor, the council, and twelve delegates chosen annually by the freeholders. Various regulations provided for the fecurity of property: and no taxes were to be imposed without the confent of the affembly. The proprietaries might mean no more, than that neither they, nor the governor and council, should impose taxes without the confent of the affembly: but the mode of expression tended to confirm the people at large in the opinion of their being exempted from all taxes which had not the confent of their own affembly. The fettlers had their lands confirmed, and granted to be now held by the free tenure of foccage, expressing a certain rent and independence. All men were declared entitled to equal privileges, on taking the oath of allegiance to the king, and of fidelity to the proprietaries.

It was not till 1669 that an affembly conflituted as abovementioned was convened: when it was enacted—" none shall be sued, during five years, for any cause of action arising out of the country—and none shall accept a power of attorney, to receive debts contracted abroad." Hence this colony was long considered as the resuge of the criminal, and the asylum of the fugitive debtor.

The proprietaries, at length diffatisfied with every fystem which they had hitherto devised for the government of their province, figned in July, a body of fundamental conflictations compiled by the celebrated Locke, giving as a reason, "That we may establish a government agreeable to the monarchy of which Carolina is a part, and may avoid making too numerous a democracy."

By this edict a palatine was to be chosen from among the proprietaries for life; who was to act as president of the palatine court, composed of the whole; which was intrusted with the execution of the powers of the charter. A body of hereditary nobility was created, and denominated landgraves and caciques; the former were to be invested with four baronies, each consisting of 12,000 acres; the latter to have two, containing one half of that quantity: and these estates were to descend with the dignities inseparably. There were to be as many landgraves as counties; and twice as many caciques, but no more. Two fifths of the counties, stiled figniories and baronies, were to be possessed by the nobility; the other three fifths, called the colonies, were

The provincial legislature, dignified with the name of parliament, was to be biennial, and to confift of the proprietaries, alias landgraves, or the deputy of each, of the cacique nobility, of the representatives of the freeholders of every district, who were to meet in one apartment, and every member to enjoy an equal vote: but no bufiness was to be proposed till it had been debated in the grand council, whose duty it was to prepare bills for the parliamentary confideration. The grand council was to be composed of the governor, the nobility, and the deputies of the proprietaries, these being absent; and was invested with the executive of the province. The church of England alone was to be allowed a public maintenance by parliament; but every congregation might tax its own members for the support of its own ministers; and to every one was allowed perfect freedom in religion. However the most degrading flavery was introduced, by investing in every man the property of his negro *.

These constitutions, confishing of 120 articles, and containing a great variety of perplexing regulations, were declared to be the facred and unalterable rule of government in Carolina for ever: and yet they were never altogether adopted. The parties engaged in this act of legislation should have reslected, that the inhabitants had fettled on conditions, which it was no longer in their power to abrogate; and that, in the forms of government which had been actually established, the people had acquired an interest which could not be taken away without their confent.

[1670.] A number of emigrants were fent in January, under William Sayle, efq; appointed governor of that part of the coast which lies south-westward of Cape Carteret, to form a colony at Port-Royal. They arrived safe: and as it was sound impracticable to conform to the constitutions, it was determined to keep as close to them as possible. Sayle dying, Sir John Yeamans had his command extended to and over this colony, in August, 1671. This year, planters reforted from Clarendon on the north, and Port-Royal on the south, to the banks of Ashley-river, for the convenience of pasture and tillage; and laid on the first high land the foundation of old Charles-Town. The proprietaries promulgated temporary laws, till through a sufficient number of inhabitants, government could be administered according to the fundamental constitutions. The temporary laws were of no long duration, being derided by a people without whose consent they had been established.

In May 1674, Joseph West, esq; was appointed governor of the fouthern colony, in the room of Sir John Yeamans, with whose conduct the proprietaries were distaissified. But the difficulty of establishing the colony was not overcome for years; not till the people repaired to it at their own expence, and men of estate ventured thither under the full persuasion of being fairly treated. In expectation of such treatment, the differences, being harrassied by persecutions in England, and dreading a popish successor, emigrated to Carolina in great numbers, and made a considerable part of the inhabitants. They acquired the honor of introducing religion into the province, while they strengthened it also by their personal accessions. But the promising appearances of the country inviting over many of a very different stamp, after a while disturbances followed.

The planters being informed, that the Oyster-point, fo delightfully formed by the confluence of the rivers Ashley and Cooper, was more convenient than what was fixed upon eight years before, and the proprietaries encouraging their inclination, they began to remove, and in the subsequent year laid the foundation of the present Charles-town, and built 30 houses [1680.] It was instantly declared the port for the purposes of traffic, and the capital for the administration of government. It was long unhealthy; but the adjacent country being now cleared and cultivated, it is allowed to enjoy the most salubrious air of Carolina.

Though the province had been formed into manors and baronies, it was not till 1682, that it was divided into three counties. In the autumn of this year, governor West held a parliament; and asterwards immediately resigned his administration to Mr. Joseph Moreton. Thence commenced a restorated change of governors. Cyrle, West, Kuerry, Moreton, were successively appointed. There was a similar change of every public officer.

These changes produced turbulency and faction.

But prior to this period, an infurrection broke out in the colony of Albemarle, in December, 1677. At the end of two years fuccessful revolt, Culpeper, who was deeply concerned in the bufiness, was dispatched with another person to England with a promise of submission to the proprietaries, on certain conditions. When about to return, after executing his truft, he was impeached by the commissioners of the customs, for acting as collector without their authority, and embezzling the king's revenue in Carolina. He was seized on board a vessel in the Downs. brought back, and in Trinity-term, 1680, tried by virtue of the statute of Henry VIII. on an indictment of high-treason committed without the realm. The famous lord Shaftesbury, then in the zenith of his popularity, appeared on his behalf, and reprefented, contrary to the most undoubted facts, "That there never had been any regular government in Albemarle, that its diforders were only feuds between the planters, which could only amount to a riot." On this Culpeper was acquitted. He is the first colonist who appears to have been regularly tried in the court of King's-bench upon that flatute *: but he was not transported from America in order to trial. His acquittal induced the proprietaries to refolve upon governing, in future, according to the portion of obedience, which the infurgents should be disposed to yield. They recommended, however, an healing disposition. But the persons bearing the chief sway, being actuated too much by a vindictive spirit, proceeded against their opponents by imprisonment, fine, and banishment, The scenes of anarchy produced by these measures were not changed, nor the condition of the colony mended by the arrival of governor Seth Sothel, in 1683, who was fent in hope of quieting the diforders by his authority, as he had purchased lord Clarendon's share of the province. He was guilty of that bribery, extortion, injustice, rapacity, breach of truft, and disobedience of orders, for five years, that the inhabitants, driven almost to despair, seized him with a view of fending him to England to answer to their complaints: but upon his intreaties, and offering to submit their mutual accusations to the next affembly, they accepted his propofal. The affembly gave judgment against him in all the above-mentioned particulars. and compelled him to abjure the country for twelve months, and the government for ever.

Charles-town having been made the provincial port, the first collector was established there in 1685. The governor and council were at the fame time ordered, "not to fail to show their forwardness in affishing the collection of the duty on tobacco transported to other colonies, and in seizing ships that presumed to trade contrary to the acts of navigation." Little regard was paid to orders so contrary to the views of every one. An illicit trade was not only practised, but justified under the clause of the patent, which the people believed to be of superior force to the law.—

Though the royal grant of 1665 was passed subsequent to the act of navigation, the present exemption was insisted upon, with the same spirit that it was contended during this reign, that a king of England may dispense with the law. The principle of the Carolinians, and the doctrine so sashionable at the court of

James, were therefore exactly the fame.

James Colleton, esq; a proprietary, was appointed governor, in August. The next year he called an affembly, in which he and his party took upon them to pass such laws as lost him the affections of the people. During the ferments that followed, Seth Sothel, whom we have feen banished from Albemarle, fuddenly arrived at Charles-town. Countenanced by a powerful party, and prefuming on his powers as a proprietary, he feized the reins of government in 1690, notwithstanding the opposition of governor and council. A general return of members was procured, who readily fanctified by their votes whatever was dictated by those that had thus acquired power. Colleton, whose conduct had been far from blameless, was instantly inpeached of high crimes and misdemeanors disabled from holding any office, and banished. Others were fined, imprisoned, and expelled the province. The proprietaries appointed a new governor; and the next year, [1692] upon the requilitions of the Carolinians, abrogated Mr. Locke's system of laws, the fundamental constitutions, which far from having answered their end, introduced only diffatisfaction, and diforders, that were not cured till the final diffolution of the proprietary government*. The operation and fate of Mr. Locke's fystem may convince us of this truth, that a person "may defend the principles of liberty and the rights of mankind, with great abilities and fuccess; and yet after all, when called upon to produce a plan of legislation, he may aftonish the world with a fignal absurdity †."

Governor Archdale arrived at Carolina in August 1695. He managed with great prudence, and succeeded so well that the assembly voted him an address of thanks. He was succeeded by 70-

feph Blake, esq; whose sentiments were so liberal, that, though a diffenter, he prevailed with the affembly to fettle 150 l. per annum upon the episcopal minister of Charles-town for ever, and likewise to furnish him with a good house, a glebe, and two ser-A very different spirit wrought in the earl of Bath, when he succeeded to the power of palatine, [1701] and became eldest proprietary. Being a zealot for the church of England, he was ambitious of establishing its worship, and of excluding non-epifcopalians from a share in the government of Carolina; a similar principle was at that time too prevalent in England. His views were feconded by the pliableness of governor Moor, who was after a while succeeded by Sir Nathaniel Johnson. Then the affembly being convened, a bill was brought in for the more effectual preservation of the government, by requiring all persons chosen members of the assembly, to conform to religious worship, and receive the facrament of the Lord's-supper, according to the usage of the church of England. By this act, all diffenters were disqualified from fitting in the assembly, though legally elected, and the candidate who had the greatest number of voices, after the disqualified dissenter, was to be admitted. The passing of this act was unconflitutional and oppressive. Another bill was passed for establishing religious worship in the province, according to the church of England, and also for the erecting of churches, the maintenance of ministers, and the building of convenient parfonages. Both these acts were afterward figned and fettled by John Lord Granville, then palatine, for himself and the other proprietors. In consequence of the last act, many oppressions were committed by the government against the diffenters, who laboured under these and other grievances, till the matter at length was brought before the house of lords, who, having fully weighed the fame, addressed the queen in favour of the Carolinians; and the laws complained of [1706] were declared null and void.

An Indian war having broken out in Carolina, and the proprietaries finding themselves unable to maintain it against the Indians, while these were supported by the French and Spaniards, [1728] resolved to surrender their charter to the crown. One-eighth of the province belonged to Lord Carteret. The proprietors of the other seven-eighths were to receive for their cession 17,500l. together with 5000l. more, due to them from the province on account of outstanding debts. The surrender and payment was confirmed by a British act of parliament, wherein was a clause, reserving alway to John Lord Carteret, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, all such estate, right, and title to one-eighth part of the share of the said provinces or territories, and to one-eighth part of all arrears, as was his due. After passing the act, the British government applied itself in earnest to encourage this colony, and Robert Johnson, esq; was appointed governor, and continued such till he died in 1735; in which year Carolina was divided into two colonies, North and South, and each placed under a separate governor.

Pennfylvania and the Delaware Counties next demand our attention. Mr. William Penn, one of the joint purchasers of the western part of the Jerseys, having received the most exact information of the country to the westward of the Delaware, while engaged in the administration of the joint purchase, became defirous of acquiring a separate estate.

He presented a perition to Charles II. in June, 1680, stating not only his relationship to the late admiral; but that he was deprived of a debt due from the crown, when the exchequer was shut. He prayed for a grant of lands, lying to the northward of Maryland, and westward of the Delaware; and added, that, by his interest, he should be able to settle a province which might, in time, repay his claims. Having the prospect of success, he copied from the charter of Maryland the Iketch of a patent which in November was laid before the attorney-general for his opinion. Penn had the same object in view as Lord Baltimore had, the guarding against the exertions of prerogative, which experience had taught both were very inconvenient. The attorneygeneral declared the clause of exemption from taxation illegal: and chief justice North, being of the same opinion, and observing its tendency, added the faving of the authority of the English parliament, fo that it was stipulated by the king, for himself and his fuccessors, "that no custom or other contribution shall be laid on the inhabitants or their estates, unless by the confent of the proprietary, or governor and affembly, or by act of parliament in England."

The next year [1681] the patent was granted, in confideration of "the merits of the father, and the good purposes of the fon, in order to extend the English empire, and to promote useful commodities." It was provided by fit clauses, that the sovereignty of the king should be preserved; and that acts of parliament, concerning trade and navigation and the customs, be duly observed. Penn was empowered to assemble the freemen, or their delegates, in such form as he should think proper, for raising money for the uses of the colony, and for making useful laws, not contrary to those of England, or the rights of the kingdom. A duplicate of the acts of the affembly was to be trans-

be declared void within fix months, if not approved.

The novel introduction of the clause subjecting the inhabitants of Pennsylvania to taxation by act of parliament, might afford an argument against being so taxed, to all the colonies whose charters contained no fuch clause. Dr. Franklin being asked, when examined by the house of commons, in the time of the slamp act, "Seeing there is in the Pennsylvania charter, an express refervation of the right of parliament to lav taxes there, how could the affembly affert, that laying a tax on them by the flamp act was an infringement of their rights?" answered, "They understand it thus-By the same charter and otherwise they are entitled to all the privileges and liberties of Englishmen. They find in the great charters and the petition and declaration of rights, that one of the privileges of English subjects is, that they are not to be taxed, but by their own confent: they have therefore relied upon it, from the first settlement, that the parliament never would or could, by colour of that chaufe, tax them till it had qualified itself for the exercise of such right, by admitting representatives from the people to be taxed." You will recollect governor Nicholfon's writing in 1698, " a great many people in all the colonies, especially in those under proprietaries, think that no law of England ought to be binding to their without their own confent; for they foolishly fay, they have no representatives fent from themselves to the parliament of England." [p. 51.]

The Pennfylvanians, it may be noted, were not declared by the patent to be English subjects. There was no express stipulation, as had been inserted in all the other colonial patents, "that the Pennsylvanians and their descendants should be considered as subjects born within the realm;" for the lawyers who revised it, considered such declarations as nugatory, since they were inferred by law *. If the right of the English parliament to tax the colonies could also have been inferred by law, why was not the express reservation of that right considered likewise as

In May, Penn detached Mr. Markham, his kinfman, with a fmall emigration, in order to take possession of the country, and prepare it for a more numerous colony. Care was taken to order an humane attention to the rights of the Indians.

'[1682.] The frame of government for Pennfylvania was published in April. It was forced from the proprietary by friends, who would not have fettled his country, unless gratified in whatever they demanded. It underwent a fimilar fate with the conflitutions of Locke; and after a variety of alterations, was at length wholly laid afide, and a fumpler form established. As a supplement to the frame, there was published, in the subfequent May, a body of laws agreed upon in England by the adventurers, which was intended as a great charter, and does honor to their wisdom as statesmen, to their morals as men, and to their spirit as colonists.

Mr. Penn, defirous of carrying his region fouthward to the Chefapeak, was continually foliciting the duke of York, for a grant of the Delaware colony. The prince at length wearied out, conveyed in August the town of Newcastle, with a territory of twelve miles round; as also that tract of land extending fouthward from it upon the Delaware to Cape Henlopen. It was known to both parties, that the title of what was now granted was extremely exceptionable, as the duke could transfer no other right than mere occupancy in opposition to the legal claim of Lord Baltimore. Penn, however, who was intent, on his own interest in those parts, immediately assumed the powers

When, for the first time, he arrived on the banks of the Delaware, October the 24th, he found them inhabited by 3,000 persons, composed of Swedes, Dutch, Finlanders, and English. Not only his own colonists, but the rest, received him with joy and respect. He was accompanied thither by about 2,000 emigrants, who being either quakers or other diffenters, wished to enjoy their peculiarities and religion, in a country that offered a peaceful afylum to the perfecuted. Mr. Penn immediately entered into a treaty with the Indians, and, agreeable to the bishop of London's counsel, purchased from them as much of the soil as the circumstances of the colony required, for a price that gave them fatisfaction: he also settled with them a very kind correspondence. In December, he convened the first affembly at Chefter, confifting of feventy-two delegates from the fix counties, into which they had divided Pennfylvania and the Delaware colony, foon after denominated the territories. The inhabitants proposed that the deputies might serve both for the provincial council and general affembly; three out of every county for the former, and nine for the latter. Their proposals were passed by the allembly without helitation into an act of fettlement. The persons returned were declared to be the legal council and asfembly, and every county was empowered to fend the fame number in future, which in the same manner should constitute the legislature; and after the addition of a few other explanations, the modified frame of government was folemnly recognized and accepted. Then an act was passed, annexing the territories to the province, and communicating to the one the same privileges. government, and laws, as the other already enjoyed. Every foreigner who promised allegiance to the king, and obedience to the proprietary, was at the same time declared to be a freeman, and entitled to his rights. By the legislative regulations, established as fundamentals by this affembly, factors who wronged their employers were to make fatisfaction and one-third over-not only the goods, but the lands of the debtor were subjected to the payment of debts-every thing which excited the people to rudeness, cruelty, and irreligion, was to be discouraged and severely punished—no person acknowledging one God, and living peaceably in fociety, was to be molested for his opinions or practice, or to be compelled to frequent or maintain any ministry whatfoever. It was a principle of the great charter, "that children shall be taught some useful trade, to the end that none may be idle, but the poor may work to live, and the rich, if they become poor, may not want.

Penn, distaisshed with the act of fettlement, without difficulty created a fecond frame, agreeing partly with the first, modified according to the act of fettlement in certain particulars, and in some measure effentially different from both: to which he procured the assent of the next assembly, in 1683; but which in time shared the fate of the former.

[1684.] He departed for England. The most violent diffensions followed almost instantly upon it, the provincial council and the assembly contending eagerly with regard to their mutual privileges and powers. Tranquility was not restored by the deputy governor Blackwell, who entered upon his government in December, 1688.

[1685.] Toward the close of this year Mr. Fenn obtained a new grant of the Delaware colony, which he had been folicit-ing for fome time.

[1688.] The Pennfylvanians and their rulers, when Black-well entered upon his administration, were so much engaged in their own contests and pursuits, and so actuated by the principles of their superior [the proprietary, whose attachments to James II. during those days are well known] that they seem to have difregarded that signal revolution which transferred their allegiance and Pennsylvania to the prince and princess of Orange: for the very laws and government of the province were administered in the name of the abdicated monarch, long after William and Mary had been formally proclaimed in other colonies.

It is a fingularity in the history of this province, that neither its various fystems, nor its fundamental laws, were communicated the state of the

nicated to the king for diffent or approbation though strongly enforced *.

Penn's adherence to James carried him to fuch lengths, that he was considered as an inveterate enemy to the protestant establishment, and was for some time excepted out of the acts of grace published by William and Mary; who appointed colonel Fletcher, by the same commission, governor both of New-York and Pennfylvania. In the commission no manner of regard feems to have been had to the original charter. But when the affembly met, though fixteen short in number to what had been' before usual, through the change made in the writs, they passed a vote, nem. con. "That the laws of this province, which were in force and practice before the arrival of this present governor, are still in force: and that the affembly have a right humbly to move the governor for a continuation or confirmation of the fame." That and subsequent assemblies shewed such a fixed determination to fecure their rights, that neither governor nor lieutenant governor could bring them to bend to their wifnes.

In 1696 Penn had fo well managed matters at the court of England, that he was restored to his right of naming a governor: and in the beginning of 1700 he went to Pennsylvania in person. After the meeting of several assemblies, he convened one in September, 1701, and informed them of the indispensable necessity he was under of going to England, to obviate some ill offices done by his and their enemies with the government there; but offered to do every thing that was in his power to secure to them their privileges and properties. The assembly, in their answer, expressed their dissastion at the state of both, and required further security; to which he gave evasive answers, but offered to leave the nomination of the deputy governor to themselves: they declined it, and went upon a new charter of privileges.

This introduced a breach between the members of the province, and those of the territories; the latter infishing upon some particular privileges, which, when refused by the others, made them withdraw from the meeting, and it required all the authority and address of the proprietary to make up the breach. At last, after great heart-burnings on both parts, just when Mr. Penn was about to embark, a charter of privileges was presented to him, and being ratisfied by him, became the rule of government in Pennsylvania. By this important charter, liberty of conscience is granted; and all christians, of whatever denomination, taking the proper oaths of allegiance and fidelity, are enabled to serve the government, either legislatively or executively. The exclusion of all persons from the legislative and executive branches, however eminently qualified, and well behaved as members of civil fociety, unless they are chrislians, does not accord with that general liberty which ought to prevail in national communities, now that the existence of all theocracy is ended by the introduction of the kingdom of Christ. The piety of the theorist, and the subtilty of the politician, desirous of securing the fupport of christians, may introduce the exclusion into written or printed agreements, but cannot establish a practical exclufion of persons opposed to christianity. He must be both simple and uninformed, who will not admit, that many deits have ferved the Pennfylvania and other excluding governments, either

By the second article of the charter it is provided, that an affembly shall be yearly chosen by the freemen, to consist of four persons out of each county, or of a greater number, if the governor and affembly shall so agree, on the 1st of October for ever, and shall fit on the 14th following, with power to choose a speaker and other their officers, and be judges of the qualifications and elections of their own members; shall fit upon their own adjournments, prepare bills, impeach criminals, and redrefs grievances; and shall possess all other powers and privileges of an affembly, according to the righ's of the free-born $ fubjects of England, and the customs observed in any of the king's plantations in America. If any county or counties shall neglect to fend deputies, those who meet, provided they are not fewer in number than two thirds of the whole, thall be confidered as the legal representatives of the province.

By the eighth article, in cases of suicide, all property is to descend to the next heirs, as if the deceased had died a natural death: nor is the governor to be entitled to any forfeiture, if a person shall be killed by casualty or accident. The fame article provides, that no act, law, or ordinance whatfoever, shall at any time hereafter be made, to alter or diminish the form or effect of this charter, or of any part of it, without the confent of the governor for the time being, and fix parts in feven of the affembly met-that the first article, relating to liberty of confcience, shall be kept without any alteration inaviolably for everand that William Penn, for himfelf, &c. does folemnly declare, that neither he, &c. shall do any thing whereby the liberties, in this charter contained, nor any part thereof, shall be infringed; and that if any thing shall be done by any person contrary thereto,

This new conflitution differed greatly from the original.-The governor might nominate his own council, and he was left

fingle in the executive part of the government, and had liberty to restrain the legislative, by resusing his affent to their bills.— The affembly, on the other hand, acquired the important privilege of propounding laws, as well as of amending or rejecting them; but though this new constitution was thankfully accepted by the province, it was unanimously rejected by the territories; and affairs stood in this untoward state when the proprietary failed for England. The representatives of the province and those of the territories divided, and acted as two dssinct bodies: and the attempts to unite them proved inessection.

The territories confifted of the three counties, Newcastle, Kent, and Suffex on the Delaware, and are commonly known by the name of the three Lower Counties on the Delaware.

Notwithstanding Mr. Penn is celebrated as the wisest of legislators, the affembly, about the year 1704, unanimously came to nine resolutions, in which they complain with great grief of him, "for undermining his own foundations; and by a subtle contrivance, laid deeper than the capacities of some could fathom, finding a way to lay aside the act of settlement, and dissolve his second charter *." He was likewise charged with having extorted from the province great sums of money. They complained also of the abuses of surveyors, the clerks of the courts, and justices of the peace, who, they said, were all put in by the proprietary, so that he became his own judge in his own cause.—These and other matters were the heads of a representation, or rather remonstrance, drawn up and sent to Mr. Penn then in England, in which he is represented as an oppressor, and as falsifying his word in almost every respect with the provincials †.

The disputes which subsisted in Pennsylvania were greatly augmented by the intemperance of the quakers themselves, who, notwithstanding all their zeal for liberty of conscience persecuted, about or soon after 1694, George Keith (who had been one of their most famous preachers) upon his conforming to the church of England; and went so far as to throw him into prison. They apologized for their conduct by pleading, that they did not punish him for his religious principles, but for having insulted the civil government ‡. If this was a good plea, the New Englanders might gain great advantages from it, in vindicating themselves as to many of the severities they practifed upon the quakers, who insulted their civil governments, beyond what will be easily credited by those, who have not had the opportunity of knowing the transactions of that period, or are not acquainted with the abusive language of some of the then leaders of that denomination—language which the body of modern quakers will not vindicate.

It only remains to give a concile account of the fettlement of Georgia.

In 1732 a number of gentlemen, confidering the vaft benefit that might arife from the tract of land lying between the Savannah and the river Alatamaha, petitioned the king for a charter, which was accordingly granted on the ninth of June. They meant, that the country should be made a bulwark for the fouthern colonies against the Spaniards; and should give employment to numbers of people, who were burdensome at home to their friends and parishes. The charter constituted them a corporation, by the name of trustees for establishing a colony, by the name of Georgia, including the country from the most northern stream of the Savannah, to the most southern stream of the Alatamaha. The corporation was to subsist for 21 years; and after the expiration of that term, the governor and all officers were to

Toward the end of August Sir William Heathcote recommended in the strongest terms, to the directors of the bank, the interests of the colony. His speech had the defired effect, and the members of the court, after his example, contributed largely toward the undertaking, as did great numbers of the nobility, gentry, clergy, and others; and the parliament granted 10,000l. By the beginning of November, about a hundred and fixteen colonists presented themselves, most of them labouring people; and were furnished with working tools of all kinds, stores, and fmall arms. Mr. Oglethorpe, one of the trustees, generously attended the first set of emigrants to Carolina, where they arrived in good health on the 15th of January, 1733. The Carolinians made them a present of 100 breeding cattle, besides hogs, and twenty barrels of rice; and furnished them with a party of horse, and with scout boats, by the help of which they reached the Savannah, where Mr. Oglethorpe, ten miles up the river. pitched upon a fpot for a town; and on February the 9th, the building of the first house commenced. The colonists were most generously affished by the Carolinians and their governor, Col. Bull, not only with their purfes, but their labour, in raifing the new town, named Savannah from the river.

Mr. Oglethorpe was waited upon by a numerous deputation from the Lower Creek nation, with whom he concluded a treaty; and foon after fat out for Charlestown on his return to England, where he arrived in 1734, bringing with him several Indian chiefs and a war captain. But before the end of March

either fent over by charity, or went at their own expence. On the 30th of October, the Indians embarked for their own country, having had an allowance while in London of 20l. a week, of which they fpent little, as they commonly ate and drank at the tables of perfons of the highest distinction. They moreover received prefents to a very confiderable amount. They embarked at Gravesend in a thip which carried over a number of Saltzburghers, being German protestants, who, with others of their countrymen that followed, fettled on the Savannah, a town they called Ebenezer, and which by their habits of industry and fobriety foon became confiderable. The Georgians made a furprifing progrefs in clearing their lands and building their houses; and, as an encouragement, the British parliament granted them a fupply of 26,000l. which, with very great private donations, was expended upon firengthening the fouth part of Georgia. This being a neceifary fervice for the colony, the truftees pitched upon the highlanders of Scotland, 160 of whom went over in 1735, fettled themselves upon Alatamaha river, and gave the name of Darien to a fort they built there, to which they afterward added a small town called New Inverness.

In February, 1736, Mr. Oglethorpe, with about 300 passengers on board two ships, anchored in the road of Savannal. He foon began building another town named Frederica.

[1737.] A mifunderstanding subsisting between the courts of London and Madrid, and advice being sent from South-Carolina to Britain, that the Spaniards at St. Augustine and the Havannah were making preparations for attacking Georgia, the government, at the request of the trustees, sent thither a regiment of 600 men, any of whom at the end of seven years might have a regular discharge, and be entitled to a grant of twenty acres of land. The parliament this year granted the colony another supply of 20,000l. which enabled the trustees to send over a fresh embarkation of persecuted protestants.

On-the breaking out of the war between England and Spain, Mr. Oglethorpe, being invested with a general's command, proceeded with a body of troops to attack St. Augustine in 1740,

In 1742 Georgia was invaded by about 5000 Spaniards and Indians from St. Augustine, in about fifty vessels of various kinds, who were repulsed by the general at the head of the English forces, and a small body of Indians. Had the Spanish descent proved successful, the Carolinians must have been in impainent danger: but the general's good conduct secured them, and he received congratulatory letters of thanks from feveral of the American governors, for his great and important fervices*.

On the review of what you have read, you will note, that the colonists were very early in declaring, that they ought not to be taxed, but by their own general courts, and that they considered subjection to the acts of a parliament in which they had no representatives from themselves, as a hardship—that like true born Englishmen, when grievously oppressed by governors or others, they resisted, deposed, and banished; and would not be quieted till grievances complained of were redressed—and that not a colony, Georgia excepted, was settled at the expence of government. Toward the settlement of the last, parliament granted 56,000l. at three different periods.

LETTER II.

Roxbury, July 9, 1772.

THE present letter begins with some special colonial transac-Lations subsequent to the glorious revolution. Upon information of the accession of William and Mary, the fort at New-York was feized by the rabble, while the lieutenant governor Nicholfon and the council waited with anxiety for orders to proclaim their new fovereign. On this occasion, Jacob Leisler placed himself at the head of the insurgents; and notwithstanding the protest of the council, possessed himself by force of a letter transmitted by king William to the lieutenant governor, or to fuch as for the time executed the law, and instantly assumed the name and exerted the authority of governor. He convened two fessions of assembly in 1690, which passed various laws. But colonel Sloughter, who had been appointed governor in August, 1689, arriving in March, 1691 Leisler was made prisoner, and, with others, condemned for treason and murder: he and his principal advifer were executed. A legal general affembly was now convened. The precaution taken in the declaration and bill of rights, by the convention and parliament, to flate the claims of Englishmen, might naturally induce the Yorkers to propose somewhat similar for themselves, had there been no prior propenfity to that bufinefs. But the prevailing opinion of the colonists naturally dictated to them the seizing of the present favorable opportunity. The New-York general affembly paffed "an act, declaring what are the rights and privileges of their majesty's subjects within the province." The law enacts, "That the supreme legislative power and authority under their majesties. shall for ever be, and reside in a governor and council, appointed by their majesties, their heirs and successors; and the people by their representatives met and convened in general affembly." It further enacts, " That no aid, tax, tallage, &c. what foever, shall be laid, affeffed, levied, or required, of or on any their majesties subjects within the province, &c. or their estates, upon any manner of colour or pretence what soever, but by the act and confent of the governor and council, and representatives of the people, in general affembly met and convened." This memorable act was a virtual declaration, that the inhabitants of the colony had a right to be represented in assembly, and enjoyed it not as a privilege, through the grace of the crown *. Six years after, in 1697, a negative was put upon the act, probably by the regency, while the king was absent, which was from April the 26th, to the middle of November, when he returned after the peace of Ryfwick was fettled.

The Massachusetts petitioned for a renewal of their former charter, but it could not be obtained; and many reasons were assigned for not granting it, among the rest, its giving them no power to lay taxes and raise money, especially on inhabitants not being of the company, and on strangers coming to or trading with them. One of the chief acts of delinquency alledged in the writ of scire facias, issued against their former charter, was, their

[1691.] King William and queen Mary granted a new charter, in which Plymouth, the Main, Acadia or Nova-Scotia, and the tract lying between Nova-Scotia and the Main, were annexed to and made a part of the Massachusetts. It was complained of, as being not much more than a shadow of the old; seeing that the appointment of the governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary, and all the officers of the admiralty, was vessed in the crown; that the power of the militia was wholly in the hands of his majesty's governor as captain general; that all judges, justices, and sheriffs, were to be nominated by the governor, with the advice of the council; that the governor had a negative upon the choice of counsellors'; that all laws enacted by the general assembly, were to be sent home for the royal approbation or difallowance; and that no laws, ordinances, elections, or acts of government whatfoever, were to be of any validity, without the confent of the governor fignified in writing. The new charter, however, conferred on the inhabitants a number of very important privileges, and was to be preferred to the old in many respects. They were informed by the best civilians, that their religious liberties were for ever secured; and that they could be touched by no tax or law, but of their own making; which had a good effect in quieting them under the variations to which they objected.

[1692.] The first act of the Maffachusetts legislature, after the arrival of the charter, was a kind of Magna Charta, afferting and fetting forth their general privileges, and this clause was among the rest, "No aid, tax, tallage, aff sfinent, custom, loan, benevolence, or imposition whatsoever, shall ve laid, affessed, imposed, or levied on any of his majesty's subjects, or their estates; on any pretence whatever, but by the act and confent of the governor, council and representatives of the people affembled in general court." The general court palled others favorable to liberty, which were perused by the ministers of England at a distant period; and with the preceding, difallowed of by the regency in 1695. In December the reasons of this dissent were transmitted to the governor and council. The following extract from the letter fent by the committee of plantations is subjoined, because of its being so extraordinary and decifive: "Whereas, by the act for fecuring the liberty of the fubject, and preventing illegal imprisonments, the writ of Habeas Corpus is required to be granted, in like manner as is appointed by the flatute of 31 Charles II. in England, which privilege has not yet been granted in any of his majesty's plantations; it was not thought in his majesty's absence, that the said act should be continued in force. and therefore the fame hath been repealed."

The above extract makes this a proper place for mentioning, that the ancient colonifts being defitute of personal security, for want of an Habeas Corpus act, were in some provinces grievously oppressed: Edward Randolph, surveyor general during the reign of William III. represented their condition to the board of trade, March 1700; and among other beneficial regulations, he recommended "That it being the practice of governors to imprison the subjects without bail, the Habeas Corpus act should be extended as fully to the colonies as it is in England." It was accordingly soon after conferred on Virginia by queen Anne. The council, in their address faid upon the occasion, "We, the council of Virginia, acknowledge your majesty's late favour, in allowing us the benefit of the Habeas Corpus act, and in appointing courts of over and terminer, for the more speedy execution of juffice, and relief from long imprisonments." The lower house in theirs, said, "We the burgesses now assembled, do befeech your Majesty to accept our fincere thanks, for your many favors bestowed on your subjects of this colony. We shall not pretend to enumerate the particulars, nor can we omit mentioning these lately communicated to us by your majesty's royal instructions to your governor, wherein you have afferted to your subjects their legal rights and properties, by allowing them the Habeas Corpus act *."

The extension of the Habeas Corpus act to the plantations by queen Anne, appears to have been only by instructions to the governors, and not by any act of parliament. By what prerogative could she extend that act to the colonists, were they not before entitled to its benefit? If entitled to, it was unjust in any power to deny them the advantage of the act; and the royal favor to the Virginians confisted solely in the queen's offerting to her fubjects their legal rights and properties, (as the burgesses expressed themselves) by giving suitable directions on the business. The high sense of colonial liberty exhibited by the York and Maffachusetts general courts, was opposed by the English go-

[1696.] An act was passed by the parliament, declaring that "All laws, bye-laws, ufages and customs, which shall be in practice in any of the plantations, repugnant to any law made or to be made in this kingdom relative to the faid plantations, shall be void and of none effect."

There might be no design on the part of the ministry of taxing any of the colonies; but about 1696, a pamphlet was published, recommending the laying a parliamentary tax on one of them. It was answered by two others much read; which totally denied the power of taxing the colonies, because they had no reprefentation in parliament to give confent. No answer, public or private, was given to these pamphlets; no censure passed upon them; men were not startled at the doctrine, as either new or illegal, or derogatory to the rights of parliament +.

Though the parliament might not then claim the right of taxing, they claimed the right of punishing disobedience to their laws, with the loss of charter privileges. In the 11th of William III. an act was passed [1699] for the trial of pirates in America, in which there is the following clause, "Be it further declared, that if any of the governors, or any person or persons in authority there, shall refuse to yield obedience to this act, such refusal is

Severity is stamped upon the very face of the act, in making the disobedience of a governor, the forfeiture of a charter, meant to fecure the liberties of thousands, who might not have any the least power of preventing such disobedience. The proprieties and charter colonies were fo difinclined to admit of appeals to his majesty in council, and were thought so to thirst after independence, that these and other objections against them were laid before the parliament, [1701] and a bill thereupon brought into the house of lords for re-uniting the right of government in those colonies to the crown: but better councils prevailed, and matters were left unaltered. Some are for bringing as a precedent for the parliament's raising a revenue from the colonies, what was passed in 1710, viz. "An act for establishing a general post-office for all her majesty's dominions, and for settling a weekly fum out of the revenues thereof, for the fervice of the war and other her majesty's occasions." By this act the postage of England, Scotland, Ireland, and America were confolidated. to the end, that a general post-office might be established through Great-Britain and Ireland, her colonies and plantations in North-America and the West-Indies, and all her other dominions, in fuch manner as might be most beneficial to the people; and that the revenue arising from the faid office might be better improved. The confolidation made a new act necessary; and afforded the opportunity of advancing the rates of letters. The weekly fum amounted to 7001. and was to be paid out of the revenue for 32 years: the payment was made perpetual in the third year of her fucceffor, having been, foon after granted, appropriated by another act toward paying off, with interest at fix per cent. the principal of 2,602,2001. which government borrowed of the public. By the act, the post-riders carrying the mail, were exempted from paying any thing for passing the ferries in North-America, and the ferryman was subjected to a penalty of five pounds, if he did not convey them over within half an hour after demand.

Whatever power over the colonies, the parliament might exercise in the act, the diffimilarity between this and the fugar act, passed in 1764, will not admit of the former's being quoted, with propriety, as a precedent for the latter. The colonists were in no wise uneasy at it, and considered not the American postage in the light of an internal tax, designed for the raising of a revenue from them; for it was but a few comparatively who were affected by it; and these were accommodated in the conveyance of their letters, received a full equivalent for the postage of them.

and were not bound to fend them by the public post, when they preferred a private conveyance.

In respect to the readiness of the colonies to co-operate with each other and the mother country, for the general good, they manifested the same as occasion required.

[1690.] The Maffachufetts general court wrote to the feveral governors of the neighbouring colonies, defiring them to appoint commissioners "to meet, advise, and conclude upon suitable methods in affishing each other, for the fafety of the whole land." The governor of New-York was requested to signify the same to Maryland, and parts adjacent.

The commissioners met on the 1st of May, at New-York, and were stiled a Congress, as may be concluded from the following paragraph in Mr. Stoughton's letter of October 20, 1693, to Lord Nottingham *: " I crave leave further to acquaint your lordship, that the governor of New-York having written unto his excellency the governor here, fignifying his appointment of a meeting at New-York, upon the first Wednesday of this month, of commissioners from the several governments of New-England, Virginia, &c. to concert and agree upon a certain quota of men and money, for the defence of Albany, &c. in observance of their majesties commands; it happened to be at such a time, and under fuch a conjuncture of affairs here, that no meet perfons could be procured to attend that Congress." It does not appear, that there was any congress between the two periods. It may also be observed, that the first was procured at the motion of the Masfachuletts general court, formed, from the necessity of the day, upon the vacated charter, before a new one was granted; and that the motion originated in the court, from zeal for the common fafety of the colonies, without any interpolition of their majesties command. We meet with no congress prior to what was thus procured.

[Oa. 14, 1709.] At the defire of colonel Vetch; there was a congress of several governors, with some of their council and assembly, to consult upon the intended expedition against Canada, and to refolve on methods for fecuring the frontiers.

[Oct. 31, 1711.] The Muffuchufetts house of affembly, at the motion of lieutenant-general Nicholson, advised, to a congress of her majesty's governors, attended with such persons as the governments might-appoint. The council appointed two, and the house three, out of their respective bodies, to attend the governor to congress, which appears to have met afterward at New-London.

But though the conduct of the Miffichufetts, in their exertions for the general good, was highly commendable, their behaviour afterward, in their own colonial affairs, under governor

Shute, was greatly censured.

The house of assembly attempted to take from colonel Shute, those powers in matters relative to the war, which belonged to him by the constitution, and to vest them in a committee of the two houses. They by degrees acquired, from the governor and council, the keys of the treasury; and no monies could be issued, not so much as to pay an express, without the vote of the house for that purpose; whereas, by the charter, all monies were to be paid out of the treasury, "by warrant from the governor, with the advice and consent of the council."

The ministry were greatly offended at the governor's being made uneasy; for colonel Shute was known at court and the offices of flate, under the character of a very worthy gentleman, of a fingular good temper, fitted to make any people under his command happy. When, therefore, they found the contrary in the Maffachusetts, they concluded, that the people withed to have no governor from Great-Britain, but wanted to be independent of the crown. The cry of the city of London ran exceedingly against them; and a scheme, that had been long planned for taking away the charter, had nearly been executed; but was fortunately frustrated by the indefatigable pains of Mr. Dummer, their then agent. Their own council at home were obliged to a confession of their illegal proceedings. [Jan. 15, 1725.] Anexplanatory charter was prepared, proposed, and accepted. Had it not been accepted, the delign was to have submitted to the consideration of the British legislature, "What further provision may be necessary to support and preserve his majesty's authority in the colony, and prevent similar invasions of his prerogative for the future *."

It had been usual to give instructions to the several governors, to recommend to the assembly, the establishing of a salary suitable to the dignity of their post; but the house had always declined complying, prudently apprehensive, that disagreeable consequences might ensue, from the independency of the governor on the people over whom he was placed. These instructions were renewed when governor Burnet was appointed to the chair, who adhering to them, and showing a fixed determination not to part with governmental rights, warm disputes followed between him and the house of representatives; whose treatment of him was so unwarrantable, that the council board, [1729] within a week after the affair, expressed their concern at the unbecoming and undustiful treatment given to his excellency, in the message of the house, on the fixth of December.

In divers inflances, they showed such a disposition to encroach upon the prerogative, to wrangle with their governors, and to dispute with the crown, that the ministry, and other persons in public offices, as is natural for those who look for submissive compliance, were much irritated; and improved to the utmost, all advantages to excite prejudices against them.

It was suggested, that they were aiming at independence; and jealousies were raised in the minds of some, that there was danger of the colonies setting up for themselves. Nevertheless, it was certain that such a scheme appeared to the whole country, wild and extravagant; because of the universal loyalty of the people, beyond what was to be found in any other part of the British dominions, together with the infancy of the colonies, and their being distinct from one another in forms of government, religious rites, emulation of trade, and, consequently, their affections; so that it was not supposable, that they could unite in so dangerous an enterprise*.

However, when the Massachusetts petitioned the house of commons, praying that they might be heard by council on the subject of grievances, the house took that opportunity of discovering how jealous it was of the kingdom's supremacy, and uncontrollable authority over the colony: for the commons having considered the matter, resolved "That the petition was frivolous and groundless, a high insult upon his majesty's government, and tending to shake off the dependency of the said colony upon this kingdom, to which, in law and right, they ought to be

The colonics might object to some acts passed respecting them, particularly—The act prohibiting the cutting down of pitch and tar trees, not being within a sence or enclosure—The act prohibiting the exportation of hats made in the colonies, even from one colony to another; and rest aining all makers of hats from taking more than two apprentices at a time, or any for less than seven years, and entirely from employing negroes in the business—The act for the more easy recovery of debts in his majesty's plantations and colonies in America, which made houses, lands, negroes, and other real estates affets for the payment of debts. It was passed in 1732, upon the petition of the English merchants trading to the colonies, who complained, that in Virginia and Jamaica, a privilege was claimed to exempt their houses, lands, tenements, and negroes, from being attached for debt: the lords of trade at the fame time represented, that the affemblies of those colonies could never be induced to divest themselves of these privileges by any act of their own. But whavever objections were made to the above acts, no general measure was adopted to obtain their repeal. They continued in being; but the hatters act was disregarded; and me hods were devited for felling the prohibited trees, when the neighbourhood wanted a supply. The operation of the act designed for the benefit of creditors, was too often, as in other countries, weakened or evaded by the dishonest debtor. Men of principle gave themselves little concern about its existence, as they had nothing to fear from it, and knew that the same was intended to prevent persons being cheated out of their property.

The fugar colonists combined together, and obtained an act against the trade carried on from the British northern provinces to the Dutch and French colonies, for foreign rum, fugar, and molasles. The act passed in 1733, laid a duty of nine-pence a galion on rum, fix-pence a gallon on molatles, and five pounds on every hundred weight of fugar, that came not from the British West-india islands, and were brought into the northern colonies. It was projetfedly defigned as a prohibition from the foreign islands; but did not answer. It was found expedient. and for the general benefit, to admit of the molaffes, &c. being mostly run into the colonies, without instilling upon the duties, or making frequent feizures. The act unhappily produced an illegal spirit of trading; but was continued by subsequent ones down to 1761; when the duty on the molasses was reduced to three-pence, to prevent its being run any longer. The act did not appropriate the monies to be railed by the duties, fo that when, in length of time, there was a fum in the hands of the receiver worth remitting, a demur enfued as to the applica-

The monies produced by this and other acts, were not confidered as real taxes, either by the colonies or the mother country. But fome perfons withed to have taxes imposed upon them, which would necessarily produce many good posts and places in America for courtiers; and during the war with Spain, which broke out in 1739, a scheme for taxing the British colonies was mentioned to Sir Robert Walpole. He smiled, and said, "I will leave that to some of my successors, who have more courage than I have, and are less friends to commerce than I am. It has been a maxim with me, during my administration, to encourage the trade of the American colonies in the utmost latitude; nay, it has been necessary to pass over some irregularities in their trade with Europe: tor, by encouraging them to an extensive growing toreign commerce, if they gain 500,000l. I am convinced, that in two years afterwards sull 250,000l. of their gains will be in his majesty's exchequer, by the labour and produce of this kingdom, as immente quantities of every kind of our manusactures go thither; and as they increase in their foreign American trade, more of our produce will be wanted. This is taxing them more agreeably to their own constitution and ours."

Had the scheme for taxing the colonies been attempted, it would have occasioned a ferment, that must have prevented those exertions in the common cause. which were given into by the New Englanders, especially the Bay-men, so the inhabitants of the Miffachusetts Bay are frequently called.

War being declared against Spain a requisition of troops was made to the Mossiachusetts, and a larger number raised and embarked on his majesty's fervice than was required, of whom, fcarce one in fifty returned.

[1744.] Upon receiving the declaration of war with France, the general court, then fitting, made immediate provision for raising forces for Annapolis in Nova Scotia: they happily arrived in season; and were the probable means of saving the country. Divers times afterward, Nova Scotia, when attacked by the French, was relieved by the Bay-men; so that during that unprosperous war, postession was always kept of it for the crown of Great-Britain.

[1745.] But the most important service to be mentioned, is the reduction of Lov/burg. Governor Shirley's heart was fet upon effecting it. He prevailed upon the two houses to lay themselves under an oath or recreey: and then communicated his plan of the expedition. A committee was appointed to confider it, and were feveral days in deliberation. After mature confideration, a majority disapproved of the proposal. The report was accepted, and the members of the court laid afide all thoughts of the expedition. By the governor's influence probably, as well as with his approbation, a petition from a number of merchants was prefented to the house of representatives, praying a re-confidera ion of their vote, and their agreement to the governor's propofal. A fecond committee reported in favor of it.-The report was debated in the house the whole day. It is remarkable, that Mr. Ohver* fell down, and broke his leg, while going to the house, with a full design of opposing the expedition.

His presence would have made a majority, and over-set it; but this accident occasioned his absence; and upon the division in the house at night, the numbers were equal. The Speaker, Thomas Hutchinson, esq; * was called upon to give the casting vote; which he did in favor of it, though he opposed it when in the committee. He was, probably, prevailed upon thus to vote, that he might fecure the favor of the governor, and render himfelf the more popular.

[Jan. 25.] The point being now fettled, there is an immediate union of both parties; and all are equally zealous in carrying the defign into execution. Messengers are dispatched as far as Pennfilvania, to entreat the junction of the feveral governments in the expedition. All excuse themselves, except Connecticut, New-Hampshire, and Rhode-Island. The first agrees to raise 500 men, the other two 300 each. Couneclicut and Rhod -Island confent also, that their colony sloops shall be employed as

The time for preparing is short. But the winter proves so favorable, that all kinds of out-door business is carried on as well, and with as great difpatch, as at any other feason. appointment of a general officer is of the utmost consequence. He must be acceptable to the body of the people; the inlistment depends upon this circumstance. It is not easy to find a person, thus qualified, willing to accept. Colonel Pepperrell + has the offer from the governor; but is rather pressed into the service. than engages voluntarily. His example, in quitting for the prefent his extensive mercantile business, has considerable influence; and induces inferior officers, and even private foldiers, to quit their finaller concerns, for the fervice of their country. Governor Wentworth, of New-Hampshire, offers afterward to take the command of the expedition. Two or three gentlemen of prudence and judgment, are confulted upon the occasion, by governor Shirley, who finds them clearly of opinion, that any alteration of the prefent command would be attended with the greatest risk, of entirely disgusting both the Massachusetts assembly and foldiers t. By the efforts of a general exertion in all orders of men, the armament is ready, fails, and arrives at Canfo the fourth of April. The Bay-men confift of 3,250 troops, exclusive of commission officers. The New-Hampshire forces, 304, including officers, arrived four days before. The Connecticut, being 516 inclusive, arrive on the 25th. The 300 Rhode-Island. ers do not arrive till the place has furrendered.

Toward the end of the month, commodore Warren arrives from the West-Indies, with a fixty gun ship, and two of forty; and joins another of forty, which had reached Canso the day before, in consequence of his orders, received while under sail from Portsmouth in New-Hampshire on her way to Britain. The men of war sail immediately to cruise before Louisburg. The forces foon follow, and land at Chapeaurouge bay the last day of April. The transports are discovered from the town early in the morning, which gives the inhabitants the first knowledge of the

The fecond day after landing, 400 men march round, behind the hills, to the north-east harbour, where they get about midnight, and fire all the houses and store-houses, until they come within a mile of the grand battery. The clouds of thick smoke, proceeding from the pitch, tar, and other combustibles, prevent the garrison's discovering the enemy, though but a few rods distant. They expect the army upon them, and defert the fort, having thrown their powder into a well; but the cannon and shot are left, and prove of service to the Americans. A party, less than twenty, come up to the battery the next morning early; and feeing no figns of men, fuspect a plot, and are afraid to enter. At length, an Indian, for a pint of rum, ventures in alone through an embrasure, and discovers the state of it to the rest, just as a number of French are relanding to recover posfession. The army has near two miles to transport their can-non, mortars, &c. through a morass. This must be done by mere dint of labour. The hardiest and strongest bodies are employed, and the fervice performed, agreeable to the advice of major Ezekiel Gilman, of Exeter, who having been used to draw the masts over the swamps, proposed making sleds to put the cannon, &c. upon, and then yoking the men together for draught. The men know nothing of regular approaches. They make merry with the terms, zigzags and epaulements; and taking advantage of the night, go on, void of art, in their own natural way.

While the forces are bufy ashore, the men of war, and other vessels, are cruising off the harbour, when the weather permits; and on the eighteenth of May, capture a French fixty-four gun ship, having 560 men on board, and stores of all forts for the garrison. This prize, with the arrival of other British ships, make the commodore's sleet eleven by the twe!sth of June, consisting of a 64, four of 60 guns, one of 50, and sive of 40. It is given out, that an attack will be made by sea with the ships, on the eighteenth, while the army do the like by land. Whether a general storm is really intended or not, the French seem to expect it, from the preparations on board the men of war. and do not incline to fland it. On the fifteenth, a flag of truce is fent to the general, defiring a ceffation of hostilities, that they may confider of articles for a capitulation. Time is allowed: but their articles are rejected by the general and commodore, and others offered, which are accepted by the French, and hof-tages exchanged. The city is delivered up on the 17th of June. But as it is the time to expect vessels from all parts to Louisburg, the French flag is kept flying as a decoy. Two East-India, and one South-Sea ship, of the value of 600,000l. sterling, are taken by the fquadron, at the mouth of the harbour, into which they undoubtedly meant to enter.

The weather proved remarkably fine during the fiege: the day after the furrender, the rains began and continued ten days inceflantly, which would undoubtedly have proved fatal to the expedition, had not the capitulation prevented. It is not of material confequence for us to determine, whether the land or fea force had the greatest share in the reduction of Louisburg. Neither would have fucceeded alone. But there was, certainly, the strongest evidence of a generous, noble, public spirit, in the New-Englanders, which first inclined them to the undertaking, and of a firmness of mind in the prosecution of it; for the labour, fatigue, and other hardships of the siege, were without parallel in all preceding American operations *. The paying of the charges of this expedition in 1748, leffens not the merit of the New-England attempt; for they began it when they had no promise, and very little prospect of being reimbursed. Had itnot fucceeded, they would not have been reimburfed, and must therefore have been involved in the greatest distress. This they forefaw, and yet cheerfully ran the risk for the public service. It would have cost the crown double the sum paid the New-England governments, to have fent an armament from Great-Britain for the reduction of the fame place. The colonies met with a heavy lofs, not eafily repaired, in the destruction of the flower of their youth, by camp fevers, other ficknelles, the hardfhips and diffresses of the siege. Of how much importance Louisburg was in the opinion of the French, appeared from their demanding two hostages of the first nobility in Britain, as pledges for its restitution.

Should you hereafter read, "The leading men in the government of the Maffachusetts, having been guilty of certain malpractices, for which they were in danger of being called to an account, projected the expedition against Cape Breton, in order to divert the florm: and proving fuccessful, the English nation was fo overjoyed, that they forgot every other idea in the general transport, fo that the planners and conductors of the expedition, instead of being called to an account for former misdemeanors, found themselves caressed and applauded"-believe it not-especially should the writer give "this public notice, I build nothing upon the prefent narration; and I only offer it (because not corroborated by sufficient evidence) as a probable case, and as my own opinion *." Should he be a D. D. you may think it would have been well for him to have recollected the complaint of Jeremiah, "I heard the defaming of many; report, fay they, and we will report:" and fo to have been filent on the head of Cape Breton. Should you judge it uncharitable to retort upon him; yet you may deem it just to remind him of his own, do you find him using such like expressions as these, "As I never believed Dr. Franklin in any public matter, excepting in his electrical experiments, I was refolved to fee with my own eyes, whether what he advanced was true or not, having a strong suspicion that he sibbed designedly, like Sir Henry Wotton's embassador, patria causa t."

But to return the year after the reduction of Louisburg, [1746.] Great-Britain entertained the defign of reducing Canada; and requisitions were made to the colonies, from New-Hamp-thire to Virginia inclusive. It was expected, that they should raise at least 5,000 men; they voted 8,200; and the Massachusetts, to the amount of 3,500, were ready to embark by the middle of July, about fix weeks from the first notice ‡. Though the expedition was not prosecuted; this did not lessen the merit of the colonies, in preparing to second the views of the British go-

[1748.] No fooner were the diffresses of war closed, by the renewal of peace; than the colonists, particularly of New England, were alarmed with the report of an American Episcopacy; which it was the most earnest desire of Dr. Thomas Secker, late archbishop of Canterbury, to establish. The Doctor, when bishop of Oxford, in his sermon before the society for propagating the gospel, &c. "began those investives against the colonists and their religious character, which have been unwarily continued, and were founded entirely upon misinformations, and misrepresentations of interested persons, the missionaries especially, who found their account in abusing better christians than themfelves *." This conduct had not the least tendency to reconcile them to the project, but the direct contrary; and argued a fecret bitterness of spirit, which promised no great moderation, if the scheme of episcopising succeeded. The talk of introducing bishops into America, was very warm among the episcopalians in Connecticut; and it is not an uncharitable conjecture, that it originated from, or was promoted by the zeal of bishop Secker. During the height of the conversation, a worthy divine, now at Rhode Island, had the hopes of a bishopric held out to him, to induce him to turn episcopalian, though without effect. The colonists had reason to dread the introduction of episcopacy, for it could not be thought, it should come unaccompanied with such a degree of civil power, as would at length trample upon the rights of other denominations. An extensive and united hierar. chy, however named, when armed with civil authority and in alliance with flate power, is a dangerous engine, if under the direction of a crafty politician. The failure of the episcopising project, at this period, might be owing in a great measure, to the part the diffenting deputation acted upon the occasion: for which the representatives of the Massachusetts-Bay returned them their thanks, in a message signed by the speaker t. But though the colonies were relieved from this cause of uneafiness, they were laid under another, by the parliament's passing an act, enacting, "That from and after the twenty fourth of June, 1750, no mill or other engine, for flitting or rolling of iron, or any plating forge, to work with a tilt hammer, or any furnace for making fleel, shall be erected; or, after such erection, continued in any of his majesty's colonies in America."

The four New England colonies however, had no just reason to complain, when the power of parliament passed an act [1751.] "to regulate and restrain paper bills of credit in said governments, and to prevent the same being legal tenders in payment of money;" as they had made the act absolutely necessary, that so British creditors might be secured from being defrauded by a legal tender of a depreciated and depreciating paper currency.

The year after the peace, a grant of 600,000 acres of the finest American land, in the neighbourhood of the Ohio, was made out to certain noblemen, merchants, and others, of Westminster, London, and Virginia, who affociated under the title of the Ohio Company. The governor of Canada obtained early intelligence of it: and was alarmed with the apprehension, that a scheme was in agitation, which would forever deprive the French of the advantage arising from the trade with the Twightwees, and cut off the communication fo beneficial to the colonies of Louifiana and Canada. He wrote therefore to the governors of New-York and Pennfylvania, acquainting them, that the English traders had encroached on the French territories, by trading with their Indians; and that if they did not defift, he should be obliged to seize them wherever they were found. This was the first time that either French or British had pretended to any exclusive trade with any Indians, or even the declared friends and allies of either; for it was expressly flipulated at the treaty of Utrecht, that, on both fides, the two nations should enjoy full liberty of going and coming among the Indians of either fide, on account of trade; and that the natives of the Indian countries should, with the same liberty, resort as they pleased, to the British or French colonies, for the purpose of trade, without any molest-ation from either the British or French subjects.

The British Indian trade had been carried on mostly with Pennfylvania, by the river Sufquehanna: a great part of it was now to be diverted into another channel by the Ohio Company; who by opening a waggon-road through the country, and building a truck-house at Will's-creek, were providing for its being carried into Virginia by the Patomack. The Pennfylvania traders, jealous of the Ohio Company, were upon the watch to injure them, which foon offered, when Mr. Gift was employed by the company, in furveying the lands upon the Ohio, in order to their procuring 600,000 acres of the best and most convenient for the Indian trade. He carefully concealed his defign from the Indians, who were no lefs fuspicious and inquisitive; and being jealous that he meant to fettle their lands, made use of threats. They were not pacified, till there was delivered to them a pretended meffage from the king of Great-Britain. The Pennfylvania traders, actuated by revenge, informed both French and Indians, what was the fervice on which he was employed; and while he was on his progress, in the spring of 1751, some French parties, with their Indians, put the governor of Canada's menace into execution, and [1753.] feized the British traders, who were trading among the Twightwees, and carried them to a fort they were building on the fouth fide of lake Erie. The British alarmed at the capture of their brethren, retired to the Indian towns for shelter, and the Twightwees, refenting the violence done their allies, affembled to the number of five or fix hundred. and foured the woods till they found three French traders whom they fent to Pennfylvania. The French, however, determined to perfift; and proceeded to build a fecond fort, about fifteen miles fouth of the former, upon one of the branches of the Ohio. They also erected a fort at the conflux of the Ohio and Wabache; and thus compleated their designed communication between the mouth of the Missippi and the river St. Lawrence. Nothing was done by the Pennsylvania government, so that the French continued to strengthen themselves without interruption; and encouraged by the little notice taken of their violence, began to seize and plunder every British trader they found on any part of the Ohio.

Repeated complaints were made to lieutenant governor Dinaviddie, of Virginia; and as the Ohio Company, whose existence depended upon slopping the French encroachments and pretensions on that river, had great influence there, that colony was prevailed upon to act with fome vigor.

The lieutenant governor having informed the house of burgesfes, on the first of November, that the French had crected a fort on the Ohio, it was refolved to fend somebody to Mr. St. Pierre, the French commandant, to demand the reason of his hostile proceedings, and to require him at the fame time, to withdraw his forces. Major Washington, who was of age only on the eleventh of the preceding February, offered his fervice on this important occasion. The distance he had to go, was more than four hundred miles; two hundred of which lay through a trackless desart, inhabited by Indians; and the season was uncommonly fevere. Notwithstanding these discouraging circumstances, the major, attended by one companion only, fat out upon this hazardous enterprise. He travelled from Winchester on foot, carrying his provisions on his back. Upon his arrival at the place of destination and delivering his message, the French commandant refused to comply, denied the charge of hostilitics, and faid that the country belonged to the king of France; that no Englishman had a right to trade upon any of its rivers; and that, therefore, he would feize according to orders, and fend prisoners to Canada, every Englishman that should attempt to trade upon the Ohio or any of its branches. Before major Washington had got back, or the Virginians had heard of the French commandant's answer, they fent out proper people, provided with materials for erecting a fort at the conflux of the Ohio and Monongahela, whom he met on his return. After excessive hardships, and many providential escapes, during his long and tedious undertaking, he arrived fafe at Williamsburgh and gave an account of his negociation to the house of burgefles, the 14th of February following. Before

Before the Virginians had finished their fort, the French came upon them, drove them out of the country, and erected a regular fort on the very spot where they had been at work. The confent of the Indian warriors had not been gained by the Virginians, or they would have supported the British against the French attack.

These proceedings of the French galled the British ministry. The Ohio Company, whose schemes were now demolished, was their fondling. They could not fubmit to have their friends fo treated; and therefore no fooner had they the news, than it was resolved to instruct the colonies to oppose the French encroachments by force of arms. The instructions were received at Virginia early in the fpring of 1754. The Virginians applied to the other colonies for additional troops. Captain James Mackay, with his independent company, upon the first order, marched with the utmost expedition from South-Carolina to their affistance. Without waiting for two independent companies from New-York, who were likewise ordered to assist them, the Virginians refolved by themselves with Mackay's company, to oppose the French encroachments; and fent off that and three hundred men raifed by the colony, under the command of late major, but now colonel Washington. An engagement ensued between a party of French from fort Du Quesne, whom colonel Washington attacked and defeated, on the twenty-eighth of Mav -which put Mr. de Villier upon marching down against him with 900 men befides Indians, and attacking him on the third of July. Washington made so brave a defence behind a small incomplete intrenchment, called fort Necessity, that Villier secing what desperate men he had to deal with, and desirous of faving his own, offered him an honorable capitulation; but the French officer was careful, in forming the articles, to throw the blame of the war upon the British, and to make it thought that they were the aggressors.

The lords commissioners for trade and plantations, had also recommended to the several colonies, to appoint commissioners to meet each other. Their lordships designed, that there should be a general league of friendship, between all the colonies, and the Indians, in his majesty's name. The Massachusetts general court not only acceded to the proposal, but both houses desired his excellency, governor Shirley. (April 10.) "to pray his majesty, that affairs which relate to the six nations and their allies, may be put under some general direction as his majesty shall think proper; that the several governments may be obliged to bear their proportions of defending his majesty's territories a gainst the encroachments of the French, and the ravages and incursions of the Indians."

[July.] A general meeting of the governors and chief men from feveral of the colonies, was held at Albany. At this congress, the commissioners were unanimously of opinion, that an union of all the colonies was absolutely necessary for their common defence. The plan was, in short, "That a grand council should be formed of members to be chosen by the affemblies, and fent from all the colonies; which council together with a governor general to be appointed by the crown, should be empowered to make general laws, to raise money in all the colonies, for the defence of the whole." It was drawn up by Mr. Hutchinson; was accepted, and fent home. Had it been approved and established, British America thought itself sufficiently able to cope with the French without further affistance: feveral of the colonies, in former years, having alone withflood the enemy, unaffifted not only by the mother country, but by any of the neighbouring provinces. A flamp act was talked of among the commissioners, of which number was Mr. (now Dr.) Franklin, one of the three from Pennfylvania; and it was thought a proper mode of taxing; under the apprehension, that in its operation it would affect the feveral governments fairly and equally. The idea of a stamp act had been held out, so early as 1739, in two publications drawn up by a club of American merchants, at the head of whom were Sir William Keith, governor of Pennfylvania, Mr. Joshua Gee, and many others. They proposed, for the protection of the British traders among the Indians, the raising a body of regulars, to be stationed all along the western frontier of the British settlements; and that the expence should be paid from the monies arising from a duty on stampt paper and parchiment in all the colonies, to be laid on them by act of parliament. The congress plan was not agreeable to the views of ministry; another was proposed—" That the governors of all the colonies, attended by one or two members of their respective councils, should assemble, concert measures for the defence of the whole, erect forts where they judged proper, and raife what troops they thought necessary, with power to draw upon the British treasury for the sums that should be wanted; and the treasury to be re-imbursed by a tax laid on the colonies by act of parliament." When you are reminded, that the governors and councils were chiefly of the king's appointing, you will be apt to view the scheme, as a most subtle and dangerous contrivance, to provide for favorites, to fap the liberties of the Americans, and eventually to chain them down to the most abject flavery. Had the congress plan met with the countenance of ministry, ministry, it might have been adopted after a while; though of that, it appeared, there could be no certainty; for when the governor laid it before the Maffachufetts affembly in October, the affembly determined, not to give it the least countenance. The ministerial plan was transmitted to governor Shirley, who was known to be for the British parliament's laying the tax. It was communicated by him to Mr. Franklin, then at his native place Boston, who soon returned it with a few short remarks, and the next day sent the governor the following letter, viz.

"SIR, Wednefday morning, Dec. 1754.

I mentioned it yesterday to your excellency, as my opinion, that excluding the people of the colonies from all share in the choice of the grand council, would probably give extreme distatisfaction, as well as the taxing them by an act of parliament, where they have no representative. In matters of general concern to the people, and especially where burdens are to be laid upon them, it is of use to consider, as well what they will be apt to think and say, as what they ought to think; I shall therefore, as your excellency requires it of me, briefly mention what of either kind occurs to me on this occasion.

First, they will say, and perhaps with justice, that the body of the people in the colonies are as loyal, and as firmly attached to the present constitution and reigning family, as any subjects in the king's dominions:

That there is no reason to doubt the readiness and willingness of the representatives they may choose, to grant from time to time such supplies for the defence of the country, as shall be judged necessary, fo far as their abilities will allow:

That the people in the colonies, who are to feel the immediate mischies of invasion and conquest by an enemy, in the loss of their estates, lives and liberties, are likely to be better judges of the quantity of forces necessary to be raised and maintained, forts to be built and supported, and of their own abilities to bear the expence, than the parliament of England at so great a distance:

The governors often come to the colonies merely to make fortunes, with which they intend to return to Britain; are not always men of the best abilities or integrity; have many of them no estates here, nor any natural connections with us, that should make them heartily concerned for our welfare; and might poslibly be fond of raising and keeping up more forces than necessary, from the profits accruing to themselves, and to make provition for their friends and dependants:

That

That the counfellors in most of the colonies being appointed by the crown, on the recommendation of governors, are often of small estates, frequently dependent on the governors for offices, and therefore too much under influence:

That there is, therefore, great reason to be jealous of a power in such governors and councils, to raise such sums as they shall judge necessary, by drast on the lords of the treasury, to be asterward laid on the colonies by act of parliament, and paid by the people here; since they might abuse it, by projecting useless expeditions, harrassing the people, and taking them from their labour to execute such projects, merely to create offices and employments, and gratify their dependants, and divide profits:

That the parliament of England is at a great distance, subject to be misinformed and missed by such governors and councils, whose united interests might probably secure them against the effect of any complaint from hence:

That it is supposed to be an undoubted right of Englishmen, not to be taxed but by their own consent given through their representatives:

That the colonies have no representatives in parliament:

That to propose taxing them by parliament, and refuse them the liberty of choosing a representative council, to meet in the colonies, and consider and judge of the necessity of any general tax, and the quantum, shows a suspicion of their loyalty to the crown, of their regard for their country, or of their common fense and understanding, which they have not deserved:

That compelling the colonies to pay money without their confent, would be rather like raifing contributions in an enemy's country, than taxing Englishmen for their own public benefit:

That it would be treating them as a conquered people, and not as true British subjects:

That a tax laid by the reprefentatives of the colonies might eafily be leffened, as the occasion should leffen; but being once laid by parliament, under the influence of the reprefentations made by governors, would probably be kept up, and continued for the benefit of governors, to the grievous burden and discouragement of the colonies, and prevention of their growth and increase:

That a power in governors to march the inhabitants from one end of the British and French colonies to the other, being a country of at least 1500 square miles, without the approbation or consent of their representatives first obtained, might occasion expeditions grievous and ruinous to the people, and would put them upon a footing with the subjects of France in Canada, that now groan under such opposition from their governor, who for two years passed, has harraffed them with long and destructive marches to the Ohio:

That, if the colonies in a body may be well governed by governors and councils appointed by the crown without representatives, particular colonies may as well, or better, be fo governed: a tax may be laid on them all by act of parliament for support of government, and their affemblies be difiniffed as an useless part of the constitution:

That the powers proposed by the Albany plan of union, to be vested in a grand representative council of the people, even with regard to military matters, are not fo great as those the colonies of Rhode-Island and Connecticut are entrusted with by their charter, and have never abused: for by this plan, the president general is appointed by the crown, and controuls all by his negative; but in these governments, the people choose the governor, and yet allow him no negative:

That the British colonies bordering on the French, are properly frontiers of the British empire; and the frontiers of an empire are properly defended at the joint expence of the body of the people in fuch empire. It would now be thought hard, by act of parliament, to oblige the cinque ports, or fea coasts of Britain, to maintain the whole navy, because they are more immediately defended by it; not allowing them at the fame time, a vote in choosing the members of parliament; and if the frontiers in America must bear the expence of their own defence, it feems hard to allow them no share in voting the money, judging of the necessity and fum, or advising the measures:

That besides the taxes necessary for the defence of the frontiers, the colonies pay yearly great fums to the mother country unnoticed; for taxes paid in Britain, by the landholder or artificer. must enter into and increase the price of the produce of land, and of manufactures made of it; and great part of this is paid by confumers in the colonies, who thereby pay a confiderable part of the British taxes.

We are restrained in our trade with foreign nations; and where we could be supplied with any manufacture cheaper from them, but must buy the same dearer from Britain, the difference of price is a clear tax to Britain. We are obliged to carry great part of our produce directly to Britain; and wherein the duties there laid upon it leffen its price to the planter, or it fells for lefs, than it would in foreign markets, the difference is a tax paid to Britain.

Some manufactures we could make, but are forbidden and must take of British merchants; the whole price of these is a tax paid to Britain.

Vol. I.

By our greatly increasing the demand and consumption of British manufactures, their price is considerably raised of late years: their advance is clear profit to Britain, and enables its people better to pay great taxes; and much of it being paid by us, is a clear tax to Britain.

In fhort, as we are not fuffered to regulate our trade, and refrain the importation and confumption of British superfluities, (as Britain can the confumption of foreign superfluities) our whole wealth centres finally among the merchants and inhabitants of Britain; and if we make them richer, and enable them better to pay their taxes, it is nearly the fame as being taxed ourselves, and equally beneficial to the crown. These kind of secondary taxes, however, we do not complain of, though we have no share in the laying or disposing of them: but to pay immediate heavy taxes, in the laving, appropriation, and disposition of which we have no part, and which, perhaps, we may know to be as unnecessary as grievous, must feem hard measure to Englishmen: who cannot conceive, that by hazarding their lives and fortunes, in fubduing and fettling new countries, extending the dominion, and increasing the commerce of their mother nation, they have forfeited the native rights of Britons, which they think ought rather to be given them as due to fuch merit, if they had been before in a flate of flavery. These, and fuch kind of things as thefe, I apprehend, will be thought and faid by the people, if the proposed alteration of the Albany plan should take place. Then the administration of the board of governors and councils fo appointed, not having any representative body of the people to approve and unite in its measures, and conciliate the minds of the people to them, will probably become fufpected and odious: dangerous animolities and feuds will arife between the governors and governed, and every thing go into confusion.

Perhaps I am too apprehensive in this matter; but having freely given my opinion and reasons, your excellency can judge better than I whether there be any weight in them; and the shortness of the time allowed me, will, I hope, in some degree, ex-cufe the imperfections of this scrawl.

With the greatest respect and fidelity, I have the honor to be, your excellency's most obedient and most humble fervant,

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN."

These letters might be transmitted to, and might dispose the ministry to decline urging their plan of uniting and governing the colonies; but Mr. Shirley wrote to governor Wentworth, of New-Hampshire, May 3t, 1755—"I may affure your excellency, from every letter I have of late received from Sir Thomas Robinson.

Robinson, I have reason to think that his majesty hath a dependance upon a common fund's being raifed in all his colonies upon this continent, in proportion to their respective abilities, for defraying all articles of expence entered into for their common defence; and that fuch an one must, in the end, be either voluntarily raifed, or elfe affeffed in some way or other." The miniftry difcovered a disposition to raise a revenue in them, which induced the Maffachusetts general court [Nov. 6.] thus to instruct their agent; "It is more especially expected, that you oppose every thing that shall have the remotest tendency to raise a revenue in the plantations, for any public uses or services of government:" he wrote to them the twenty-ninth of May following, "The inclinations I have reason to think still continue for raifing a revenue out of the molaffes trade." The alarming state of public affairs might divert the ministry from pursuing their inclinations.

It had been concluded to take effectual measures for driving the French from the Ohio; and for the reduction of Niagara, Crown-Point, and their forts in Nova-Scotia. General Braddock was accordingly fent from Ireland to Virginia, with two regiments of foot; and when arrived, and joined by the rest of the forces destined for that service, found himself at the head of about 2200 men. He had bravery, but wanted other qualifications to render him fit for the service to which he was appointed. His feverity prevented his having the love of the regulars: his haughtiness, the love of the Americans; and what was worse, difgusted the Indians, and led him to despise the country militia, and to flight the advice of the Virginia officers. Colonel Woshington earnestly begged of him, when the army was marching for fort du Quesne, to admit of his going before, and scouring the woods with his rangers, which was contemptuously refused. The general had been cautioned by the diske of Cumberland, to guard against a surprise; and yet he pushed on heedlessly with the first division, confishing of 1400 men, [July 9, 1755] till he fell into an ambuscade of 400, chiefly Indians, by whom he was defeated and mortally wounded, on the ninth of July. The regulars were put into the greatest panic, and fled in the utmost consusion: the militia had been used to Indian fighting, and were not so terrifi-The general had difdainfully turned them into the rear: they continued in a body, unbroken, and ferved under colonel Washington as a most useful rear-guard; covered the retreat of the regulars, and prevented their being entirely cut off.

Previous to this, and agreeable to the views of the British ministry, the Massachusetts alsembly; who had never been remiss upon the prospect of a French war, raised a body of troops, which were fent to Nova-Scotia, to affift lieutenant-governor Lawrence in driving the French from their feveral encroachments within that province. The fecrecy and difpatch used in this fervice was rewarded with success.

The expedition against Niagara was entrusted with governor

Shirley; but failed through various causes.

Sir William (then colonel) Johnson, was appointed to go against Crown-Point. The delays, slowness, and deficiency of preparations, prevented the several colonies joining their troops till about August. Meanwhile the active enemy had transported forces from France to Canada, marched them down to meet the provincials, and attacked them; but, meeting with a repulse, lost six hundred men, besides having their general baron Dieshau, wounded and made prifoner.

The Maffachusetts the next year, raised a great armament to go to Crown-Point; but Lord Loudon, on his arrival, did not think it proper that the forces should proceed. Afterward a temporary mifunderstanding took place between his lordship and the general court; from his apprehending, that they thought a provincial law necessary to enforce a British act of parliament, and were willing to dispute upon that subject. He determined to have no dispute, but that the troops under his command should be quartered agreeable to what he thought the public good required; and wrote to governor Pownall, [Nov. 15, 1757.] "I have ordered the messenger to wait but 48 hours in Boston; and if, on his return, I find things not fettled, I will instantly order into Boston the three battalions from New York, Long-Island, and Connecticut; and if more are wanted, I have two in the Jerfeys at hand, befide three in Pennsylvania." Notwithstanding this declaration, on December the fixth, the legislature passed an act, which led him to conceive, that he was under an absolute necessity of fettling the point at once, and therefore he ordered the troops to march. The general court finding how matters were going, did not venture upon extremities, but became pliable: so that his lordship wrote, December 26, "As I can now depend upon the affembly's making the point of quarters eafy in all time coming, I have countermanded the march of the trrops." The general court were certainly terrified; and to remove all unfavorable impressions, faid in the close of the address to the governor, [Jan. 6, 1758] "The authority of all acts of parliament which concern the colonies, and extend to them, is ever acknowledged in all the courts of law, and made the rule of all judicial proceedings in the province. There is not a member of the general court, and we know no inhabitant within the bounds of the government, that ever questioned this authority. To pre-1,6137

vent any ill confequences that may arise from an opinion of our holding such principles, we now utterly disavow them, as we should readily have done at any time past, if there had been occasion for it; and we pray that his lordship may be acquainted therewith, that we may appear in a true light, and that no impressions may remain to our disadvantage." However they might not question, whether the authority of acts of parliament, concerning and extending to the colonies, was made the rule of all judicial proceedings in the province; yet you are not to infer from their disavowal of the contrary principle, that they admitted the right of parliament, either to impose internal taxes, or

When, happily for the British nation the great Mr. Pitt was placed at the head of the ministry, the face of affairs was foon changed; the war was profecuted with unexampled fuccefs, and the enemy at length driven out of America. But the frequent delays given to the raifing of the necessary supplies, especially in proprietary governments, through the refufal of their governors or councils, to admit that the estates of the proprietors should be taxed, led Mr. Pitt to tell Mr. Franklin, that when the war clofed, was he in the ministry, he should take measures to prevent its being in the power of the colonies, to hinder government's receiving the fupplies that were wanted; and he added, that, was he not in the ministry, he would advise his successors to do What these measures were, he did not mention. But toward the close of 1750, or the beginning of 1760, Mr. Pitt wrote to Francis Fauquier esq, lientenant governor of Virginia, and mentioned in his letter, that though they had made grants to the colonies, yet, when the war was over they should tax them in order to raife a revenue from them. Mr. Fauguier, in his anfwer, expressed his apprehension, that the measure would occafion great disturbance. The answer might divert Mr. Pitt from his intention. Many months before, the prefent Lord Camden (then Mr. Pratt,) faid to Mr. Franklin, in a course of free conversation, " For all what you Americans fay of your loyalty, I know you will one day throw off your dependence upon this country; and notwithstanding your boasted affection to it, will set up for independence." The other answered, " No such idea is entertained in the mind of the Americans: and no fuch idea will ever enter their heads, unless you grossly abuse them." "Very true, freplied Mr. Pratt) that is one of the main causes I see will happen, and will produce the event."

The colonies in general, and the Massachusetts in particular, complied with the requisitions of the minister, and showed themselves ready to support his plans for the reduction of the French power. To affift and encourage their extraordinary exertions, the parliament granted them during the war, at different periods, no less than f. 1,031,666 13s. 4d. But though the large importation of specie annually, did not answer one half of their expences, it was fill of fuch benefit to each government, that they cheerfully seconded the views of ministry. Upon application from admiral Saunders, the squadron employed against Louisburg and Quebec, was supplied by 500 seamen from the Massachusetts; beside, many were at several times impressed oùt of veffels on the fifling banks. The colonies loft by the war, 25,000 of their robust young men, exclusive of failors. Maffachusetts continually raised the full number of troops asfigured them: nor was it to be afcribed to the peculiar address of. Mr. Pownall, who guided them with a filken cord, and by praifing them plentifully, and flattering their vanity, did bufiness with them in an eafy manner; for it was the fame, after he was fucceeded by governor Bernard. [August 13, 1760.] their annual quota of men, in some years of the war they garrisoned Louisburg and Nova-Scotia, which gave the regular forces opportunity for retaining Canada. The whole cost they were at upon these accounts, and for scouting companies ent into the Indian country, and for two armed veffels built and maintained for the protection of the trade, amounted to 754,5981. 10s. 10d1. flerling. In this fum, the expence of many forts and garrifons on the frontiers is not included. Add, that no estimate can be made of the cost to individuals, by the demand of personal service. They that could not ferve in person, who were much the greater number, when it came to their turn, were obliged to hire fubflitutes at a great premium. They also who could not be imprefled, to lighten the burdens of others, advanced largely for encouraging the levies. Moreover, the taxes were exceeding heavy. A Boston gentleman, of reputation and fortune, sent one of his rate bills to a correspondent in London, for his judgment on it; and had for aufwer, "That he did not believe there was a man in all England, who paid so much in proportion toward the support of government." Such was the allessment of the town in one of the years, that if a man's income was 6ol. per annum, he had to pay two-thirds or 40l., and in that proportion whether the fum was more or less; and if his house or jand was valued at 2001. per annum, he was obliged to pay 721. He had also to pay for his poll, and those of all the males in his house, more than fixteen years old, at the rate of 14s. 3d. each: and to all must be added, the part he paid of the excise on tea, coffee, rum, and wine *. Other towns and colonies might not have been affeffed fo exorbitantly, but fome must certainly have been burdened with taxes.

The above flatement of expences is thought to be more correct than what governor Bernard transmitted, in his letter of August 1, 1764, to the lords of trade, in which he wrote, " From 1754 to 1762, the fums issued amount to 926,000l. sterling; out of which deduct, received by parliamentary grant, 328,000l. and the ordinary expences of government estimated at 108,000l. there remains 490,000l. that is near 500,000l. fterling expended by this province in the extraordinary charges of the war within eight years. An immense sum for such a small state! the burden of which has been grievously felt by all orders of men. Whereas if we compare this with the fouthern governments, Pennsylvania for instance, which has expended little more than they have received from parliament, and Maryland which has expended fcarce any thing at all, we cannot fufficiently admire the inequality of the burden between one province and another, and when Pennsylvania has not been prevented by domestic diffenfions, and have as it were done their best, they have fent to the field only 2,700 men, when this province has fent 5,000— 5,500, and one year 7,000. And notwithstanding the vast sums this province has raifed, it has, by fevere taxations, kept its debt under."

The first part of governor Bernard's administration was agreeable to the Massachusetts general court. The two houses, in answer to his speech, [May, 1761.] said, "It gives us pleasure to see, that the civil rights of the people are not in danger; nor are we in the least degree suspicious, that they ever will be, under your excellency's administration. The experience we have had of your excellency's disposition and abilities, encourage us to hope for a great share of public happiness under your administration." The next year, the governor told them, at the close of the session, [April 23, 1762.] "The unanimity and dispatch with which you have complied with the requisitions of his majesty, require my particular acknowledgment," In his speech to the new court, [May 27.] he said, "Every thing that has been required of this province, has been most readily complied with."

[May 31. 1763.] Both houses, in their address to him, expressed themselves thus: "We congratulate your excellency upon that unanimity, which your excellency recommends, and which was never greater in the province than at this time."—The governor at the close of the session, declared his great satisfaction in having observed, that the unanimity they assured him of, had fully evinced inself throughout all their proceedings.

But the lieutenant governor Mr. Hutchinson, gained after a while too much ascendency over him, and encouraged him in the purfuit of wrong measures, highly offensive to the colony. He had indeed done him an irreparable injury, not long after his coming to the chair. Colonel Fames Otis (who was repeatedly returned for Barnstable in Plymouth county, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts which had been made to prevent it, on account of his fiding with government) being a lawyer, had been promifed by Mr. Shirley, when in the chair, to be made a judge of the fuperior court, upon an opportunity's offering. The first vacancy which happened, was filled up by the appointment of the fecretary's fon in law; for which Mr. Shirley apologized, by pleading a promife made to the fecretary, and his having forgotten the former one. Mr. Otis was fatisfied with a fresh assurance of the next vacancy, which was confidered by him in the light of a governmental promife; and it was expected that whenever a new vacancy happened, Mr. Otis would be appointed. There was no new-vacancy till a short time after governor Bernard entered upon his administration, when chief justice Sewall died.— Upon this death Mr. James Otis the fon, of whom there will be a call to make frequent mention, expressed himself as follows: "If governor Bernard does not appoint my father judge of the fuperior court, I will kindle fuch a fire in the province as shall finge the governor, though I myself perish in the slames." Mr. Hutchinson, however, hurried to Mr. Bernard, procured a promife, which being once given the governor would not retract, and got himself appointed chief justice, by which he gratified both his ambition and covetousness, his two ruling passions. The friends of government regretted the appointment, foreboding the evils it would produce. The governor lost the influence and support of colonel Otis. The fon quitted the law-place he held; would never be perfuaded to refume it, or to accept of another; joined himself to the party which was jealous that the views of administration were unfavorable to the rights of the colony, and flood ready to oppose all encroachments; and soon became its chief leader. He fignalized himself, by pleading in a most masterly manner, against granting writs of affistance to custom-house officers. These writs were to give them, their deputies, &c. a general power to enter any houses, &c. that they would fay they Juspecled. The cultom-house officers had received letters from home, directing them to a more streamous exertion in collecting the duties, and to procure writs of affiffance. The idea of these writs excited a general alarm. A flrong jealoufy of what might be eventually the effect of them upon the liberties of the people, commenced. They might prove introductory to the most horrid abuses; which the meanest deputy, of a deputy's deputy might practife with impunity, upon a merchant or gentleman of the first character; and there would be the greater danger of fuch abuses, by reason of the immense distance of the scene of action from the feat of government. The voice of the complainant would not be heard three thousand miles off, after the fervants of government had deafened the ears of administration by mifreprefentations. From this period may be dated, the fixed, uniform, and growing opposition, which was made to the minifterial plans of encroaching upon the original rights and long eftablished customs of the colony. In 1761, the officers of the customs applied to the superior court for such writs. The great opposition that was made to it, and the arguments of Mr. Otis, disposed the court to a refusal; but Mr. Hutchinson, who had obtained the place of chief justice, prevailed with his brethren to continue the cause till next term; and in the mean time, wrote to England, and procured a copy of the writ, and fufficient evidence of the practice of the exchequer there, after which like writs were granted. But before this was effected, Mr. Otis was chosen one of the representatives for Boston, by the influence of the friends to liberty; whose jealousies there and elsewhere, afterward increased apace, upon hearing that the British officers infifted frequently upon the necessity of regulating and reforming, as they stiledit, the colonial governments; and that certain travellers were introduced to particular persons [1762.] with a -"This is a gentleman employed by the earl of Bute to travel the country, and learn what may be proper to be done, in the grand plan of reforming the American governments." It was understood, that their business was to make thorough observation upon the flate of the country, that fo the ministry might be enabled to judge what regulations and alterations could fafely be made in the police and government of the colonies, in order to their being brought more effectually under the government of parlia-They were also as much as possible, to conciliate capital and influential characters, to ministerial measures speedily to be adopted. The British ministry have been greatly mistaken, in supposing it is the same in America as in their own country. Do they gain over a gentleman of note and eminence in the colonies, they make no confiderable acquisition. He takes few or none with him; and is rather despised, than adhered to by former friends. He has not, as in Britain, dependants who must act in conformity to his nod. In New-England especially, individuals are fo independent of each other, that though there may be an inequality in rank and fortune, every one can act freely according to his own judgment. But

But nothing, it may be, excited a greater alarm in the breafts of those to whom it was communicated, than the following anecdote, viz. The Rev. Mr. Whitefield, ere he left Portsmouth in New Hampshire, on Monday afternoon, April the second 1764, fent for Dr. Langdon and Mr. Haven, the congregational ministers of the town, and upon their coming and being alone with him, faid, "I can't in confcience leave the town without acquainting you with a fecret. My heart bleeds for America. O poor New England! There is a deep laid plot against both your civil and religious liberties, and they will be loft. Your golden days are at an end. You have nothing but trouble before you. My information comes from the best authority in Great Britain. I was allowed to speak of the affair in general, but enjoined not to mention particulars. Your liberties will be lost *." Whitefield could not have heard what the commons did in the preceding month; his information must have been of an earlier date, and might have been communicated before he left Great Beside the general design of taxing the colonies, the plan was probably, this in fubflance—Let the parliament be engaged to enter heartily and fully into American matters; and then under its fanction, let all the governments be altered, and all the councils be appointed by the king, and the affemblies be reduced to a small number, like that of New-York. After that, the more effectually to fecure the power of civil government by the junction of church influence, let there be a revifal of all the acts in the feveral colonies, with a view of fetting afide those in particular, which provide for the support of the ministers. But if the temper of the people makes it necessary, let a new bill for the purpole of supporting them pals the house, and the council refuse their concurrence; if that will be improper, then the governor to negative it. If that cannot be done in good in policy, then the bill to go home, and let the king disallow it. Let bishops be introduced, and provision be made for the support of the episcopal clergy. Let the congregational and presbyterian clergy, who will receive episcopal ordination, be supported; and the leading ministers among them be bought off by large salaries.— Let the liturgy be revised and altered. Let episcopacy be accommodated as much as possible to the cast of the people. Let pla--ces of power, trust and honor be conferred only upon episcopalians, or those that will conform. When episcopacy is once thoroughly established, increase its resemblance to the English hierarchy, at pleafure.

^{*} Dr. Langdon told it me in conversation; and afterward mentioned it in his fermon preached before the convention of the minifers.

These were the ideas which a certain gentleman communicated to Dr. Stiles*, when they were riding together in 1765.—The Doctor, after hearing him out, expressed his belief, that before the plan could be effected, such a spirit would be roused in the people, as would prevent its execution. The good man groaned and replied, "If the commotions now existing prevail on the parliament to repeal the stamp-act, I am afraid the plan

In reference to alterations in the civil line, Dr. Langdon informed me, that governor Wentworth told him, the Maffachufetts and New Hampshire were to be one government, under one governor: the Doctor thought the delign of joining Rhode Island with them was also mentioned, though of this he could not be The New England colonies would have fuffered most by the proposed alterations, while they deserved it the least, and were entitled for their ready exertions, to a return expressive of gratitude. Many of the common foldiers, who gained fuch laurels, by their fingular bravery on the plains of Abraham, when Wolfe died in the arms of victory, were natives of the Maffachusetts-Bay. When Martinico was attacked in 1761, and the British force was greatly weakened by death and sickness, the timely arrival of the New England troops, enabled the former to profecute the reduction of the island to an happy issue. A part of the British force being about to fail from thence for the Havannah, the New-Englanders, whose health had been much impaired by fervice and the climate, were fent off in three ships. to their native country for recovery. Before they had com pleted their voyage, they found themselves restored, ordered the ships about, steered immediately for the Havannah, arrived whe the British were too much reduced to expect success, and by their junction ferved to immortalize afresh, the glorious first of August, old stile, in the surrender of the place on that memorable day: they exhibited, at the fame time, the most figual evidence of devotedness to the parent state. Their fidelity, activity. and courage, were fuch as to gain the approbation and confidence of the British officers +.

As to the religious part of the plan, recollect what has been already mentioned of archbishop Secker; carefully peruse Dr. Mayhew's noted answer to one of his publications, and what is related concerning him in the collection of papers above quoted; and you will scarce doubt, "but that it was the metropolitan's intention to reduce all the British colonies under episcopal authority." Remember also, that the bishop of Landaff in his sermon of 1766, affures us, that the establishment of episcopacy being obtained, "the American church will go out of its infant state; be able to stand upon its own legs; and, without foreign help, support and spread itself; and then this society will be brought to the happy issue intended." Mr. Whitesield said upon it, in his letter to Dr. Durell, "supposing his lordship's affertions true, then I fear it will follow, that a society, which since its first institution hath been looked upon as a society for propagating the gospel hath been all the while rather a society for propagating episcopacy in sorting parts."

This letter will close with a few more articles of information. Among the original instructions to Benning Wentworth, esq; governor of New-Hampshire, signed June 30th, 1761, the 27th, says, "You are not to give your assent to, or pass any law imposing duties on negroes imported into New-Hampshire:" some of the colonies were for discouraging the introduction of negroes—for which purpose they wished to lay a duty upon them. The 69th contains the following direction, "No school-masser to be henceforth permitted to come from England without the licence of the bishop; and no other person now there, or that shall come from other parts, shall be admitted to keep school without your licence first obtained."

[Feb. 1762.] A law passed in the Massachusetts, entitled. "An act to incorporate certain persons, by the name of The fociery for promoting Christian Knowledge among the Indians in North America; but was difallowed at the court of St. James's the 20th of May, 1763. Mr. Jasper Mauduit in his letter to Mr. Bowdern of April 7, 1763, writes, " So long ago as the 1cth of December, I was told at the plantation-office, that this act was opposed by the archbishop and the society for propagating the gospei. Mr. Pownall told me, that the bill would not pass; that the lords would not dispute the laudableness of the design, but there were political reasons for not confirming it; that the people u ight apply the money to oppose the missionaries of the church of England. I answered, I wished that the society for propagating the gospel had employed their missionaries more among the Indians, than they had hitherto done in North America." From what passed, the real reasons for disallowing the bill may be gathered.

LETTER III.

Roxbury, December 24, 1772.

R. Ifrael Mauduit, the Maffachusetts agent, gave early notice of the ministerial intentions to tax the colonies; but the general court not being called together till the latter end of the year, instructions to the agent, though folicited by him, could not be fent in feafon.

[1764.] The house of representatives came to the following resolutions—"That the sole right of giving and granting the money of the people of that province, was vested in them as their legal representatives; and that the imposition of duties and taxes by the parliament of Great-Britain. upon a people who are not represented in the house of commons, is absolutely irreconcileable with their rights."—"That no man can justly take the property of another without his consent; upon which original principle, the right of representation in the same body which exercises the power of making laws for levying taxes, one of the main pillars of the British constitution, is evidently founded,"

These resolutions were occasioned by intelligence of what had been done in the British house of commons. It had been there debated in March, whether they had a right to tax the Americans, they not being represented, and determined unanimously in the affirmative. Not a fingle person present ventured to controvert the right. Soon after, the fugar or molasses act was passed: [April 5.] and, "it is certainly true, that till then, no act avowedly for the purpose of revenue, and with the ordinary title and recital taken together, is found in the statute book. All before flood on commercial regulation and restraints *." It is stiled "an act for granting certain duties in the British colonies and plantations in America, for continuing, amending, and making perpetual an act passed in the fixth year of George the fecond, (entitled an act for the better fecuring and encouraging the trade of his majefly's colonies in America) for applying the produce of fuch duties, &c." From its perpetuating the fugar act of George II. it is called the fugar or molasses act. It runs thus, "Whereas it is expedient, that new provisions and regulations should be established in improving the revenue of this kingdom, and for extending and fecuring the navigation and commerce between Great-Britain and your majesty's dominions in America—And whereas it is just and necessary, that a revenue be raifed in America for defraying the expences of defending, protecting, and fecuring the fame—We the commons, &c. toward raising the same, give and grant unto your majesty after the 29th of September, 1764, upon clayed fugar, indigo and coffee of foreign produce-upon all wines, except French-upon all wrought filks, Bengals and stuffs mixed with filk of Persia, China, or East-India manufacture—and all calicoes painted, printed or stained there (certain specified duties)—upon every gallon of molasses and syrups, being the produce of a colony not under the dominion of his majesty, the sum of three-pence-the monies arifing, after charges of raifing, collecting, &c. are to be paid into the receipt of his majesty's exchequer—shall be entered separate, and be referved to be disposed of by parliament, toward defraying the necessary expences of defending, &c. the British colonies." The wording of the act might induce the colonies to view it as the beginning of forrows; and they might fear that the parliament would go on in charging them with fuch taxes as it pleased, for such military force as it should think proper.-This ill prospect seemed to the Americans, boundless in extent, and endless in duration.

They objected not to the parliament's right of laying duties to regulate commerce: but the right of taxing them was not admitted. The ministerial plan, sent to Mr. Shirley in 1754, occafioned much conversation on the subject, and the common opinion was, that the parliament could not tax them, till duly reprefented in that body, because it was not just, nor agreeable to the nature of the English constitution. But though few or none were willing to admit the right; the generality were cautious how they denied the power, or the obligation to submit on the part of the Americans, when the power was exercised. Even Mr. Otis tells us, we must and ought to yield obedience to an act of parliament, though erroneous, till repealed *." "The power of parliament is uncontrolable, but by themselves, and we must obey. There would be an end of all government, if one or a number of subordinate provinces should take upon themfelves, so far to judge of the justice of an act of parliament, as to refuse obedience to it. If there was nothing else to restrain fuch a step, prudence ought to do it, for forcibly refisling the parliament and the king's law is high treason. Therefore let the parliament lay what burthens they please upon us, we must, it is our duty to fubmit, and patiently to bear them, till they will be pleased to relieve us t." He went so far as to publish, "It is certain that the parliament of Great-Britain has a just and equitable right, power and authority, to impose taxes on the colonies, internal and external, on lands as well as on trade #." "The fupreme legislative represents the whole society or community, as well the dominions as the realm. This is implied in the idea of a fupreme power; and if the parliament had not fuch an authority, the colonies would be independent †." But the two last quotations were extorted from him, through fear of being called to an account for the part he had acted, or for what he had before advanced in print, conversation or debate. His first pamphlet, The Rights of the BRITISH Colonies, which had been twice read over in the house of assembly within the space of five days, though guarded by fome expressions, had a strong tendency to excite a powerful opposition to ministerial plans; especially where he fays, "I cannot but observe here, that if the parliament have an equitable right to tax our trade, it is indisputable, that they have as good a one to tax the lands and every thing else. There is no foundation for the diffinction fome make in England, between an internal and external tax on the colonies t." These expressions could not but spread a general alarm through the country, and inflame every planter against parliamentary taxation. The house had so high an opinion of this pamphlet, that they ordered it to be fent over to Mr. Mauduit, with a letter, wherein they instructed him to use his endeavours to obtain a repeal of the fugar act, and to exert himself to prevent a stamp act, or any other impositions and taxes, upon this and the other American provinces. They do not appear to have made any particular objection to the term revenue introduced into the fugar act; but to have confined their objections to the laying on of the duty, when they were not represented.

The act disgusted the more, because of its being so unseasonable. The duties were to be paid in specie, while the old means of procuring it were cut off. The ministry, resolved to prevent smuggling, obliged all sea officers, stationed on the American coasts, to act in the capacity of the meanest revenue officers, making them submit to the usual custom-house oaths and regulations for that purpose. This proved a great grievance to the American merchants and traders. Gentlemen of the navy were unacquainted with custom-house laws. Many illegal seizures were made. No redress could be had but from Britain; which it was tedious and difficult to obtain. Beside, the American trade with the Spaniards, by which the British manufactures were vended in return (for gold and filver in coin or bullion, cochineal, &c. as occasion ferved) was almost destroyed instantly, by the armed ships under the new regulations. The trade was not literally and strictly according to law, but highly beneficial; and a thorough states in an would have declined employing his own navy in crushing it. The trade also from the northern colonies with the Frenck West-India islands was nearly suppressed. These irritating measures strengthened the opposition to the fugar act.

June 13.] The Maffachufetts affembly, who were the first representative body, that took the act into confideration, ordered, that Mr. Otis and four others of the house should be a committee in the recess of the court, to write to the other governments, and acquaint them with the inftructions voted to be fent to their agent; and that the faid committee, in the name and behalf of the house, should defire the several assemblies on the continent to join with them in the fame measures. The committee attended to the bufiness: and the end proposed by it was answered: committees were moreover appointed by divers other colonies to correspond with the feveral assemblies, or committees of assemblies on the continent. Thus a new kind of correspondence was opened between the colonies, tending to unite them in their operations against ministerial encroachments on their privileges; and which proved of great advantage to them afterward.

[Oct. 24.] At the next fession a committee was appointed to consider the state of the province, as it might be affected, by certain duties and taxes laid and proposed to be laid by acts of parliament upon the colonies. The confequence was, a committee of the council and house to prepare an address to the parliament. The lieutenant-governor, Mr. Hutchinson, who was of the council, was chairman, but declined drawing up any. Several were proposed, which expressed in strong terms an exclusive right in the affembly to impose taxes. He urged the indecency and bad policy, when they had the resolutions of the house of commons before them, of fending an address, afferting, in express words, the contrary. Many days having been spent upon the business, at the defire of the committee, he drafted an address, which confidered the fole power of taxation as an indulgence of which they prayed the continuance, and it was unanimoufly agreed to. The petition does not intimate the least denial of the right of parliament to tax them; but fets forth the impolicy of the laws and the hardfhips brought upon the petitioners, and prays that they may be relieved from the burdens brought upon them by the fugar at; that the privileges of the colonies relative to their internal taxes, which they have so long enjoyed, may be still continued:

tinued; or that the confideration of fuch taxes as are proposed to be laid upon the colonies, may be referred, until the petitioners, in conjunction with the other governments, can have an opportunity to make a full representation of the state and condition of the colonies, and the interest of Great-Britain with regard to them. The proceeding of the general court was approved of out of doors, until the copy of the New-York address was received, which was so high, that many of the friends of liberty were mortissed at their own conduct, and if possible would gladly have recalled their own doings *.

[Nov. 18.] The Maffachufett's petition was forwarded by governor Bernard, and accompanied with a letter to lord Halifax; in which he wrote, " Maffachufetts is the only one of the old colonies, that I know of, that enjoys a specie currency. This reflects great honor upon the province itself, as it is a great inflance of their prudence, who took hold of a fingular opportunity to destroy their paper money, which other colonies who had it equally in their power neglected. But I fear, that if the great fums, which are expected to be raifed in America are to be tranfported to Great-Britain, there will foon be an end of the specie currency of the Massachusetts; which will be followed by a total discouragement for other provinces to attempt the same in future. In which case, perpetual paper money, the very negative power of riches, will be the portion of America." After arguing against the duties, from America's being unable, for want of a fufficient specie currency, to pay them without being drained of their specie, as it would require a dead flock of three years value of the annual income of the revenues, he added, "If due care be taken to confine the fale of manufactures and European goods (except what shall be permitted) to Great-Britain only, all the profits of the American foreign trade will necessarily centre in Great-Britain; and therefore if the first purpose is well secured, the foreign American trade is the trade of Great-Britain. The augmentation and diminution, the extension and restriction, the profit and loss of it all, finally comes home to the mother country. It is the interest of Great-Britain, that the trade to both the Spanish and French West-Indies should be encouraged as much as may well be, and the British West-Indies should be taught that equitable maxim, live and let live." It appeared to be the decided opinion of the governor, that the fending home the produce of the duties and taxes proposed, would take from the Americans the means of trade, and render it impracticable for them to make remittances to Great-Britain.

^{*} Mr. Hutchinsen's letter of March 8, 1766.

The Virginia council and house of burgesses petitioned the king, prefented a memorial to the house of lords, remonitrated to the house of commons. New-York, Rhode-Island, &c. petitioned.

The New-York petition was conceived in fuch strong terms, and deemed fo inflammatory, that their agent could not prevail on any one member of the house to present it.

The colonies denied the parliamentary right of taxation many months before any member of the British parliament uttered a fingle fyllable to that purpose: and the American opposition to the stamp-act was fully formed before it was known by the colonists, that their cause was espoused by any man of note at home, as Britain is stilled.

Beside the colonial proceedings related above, it must be noted. that the inhabitants of feveral places met and agreed not to buy any clothing (they could do without) which was not of their own manufacturing. Divers affociations also were formed, all of whom refolved to confume as few British manufactures as poffible.

The raising of a revenue from the molasses trade, and a fund to defray the expences of defending the colonies, were in contemplation nine years before *; but the refolutions taken by the house of commons, in the beginning of this year, might be forwarded by Mr. Huske, an American, a native of Portsmouth, in New-Hampshire, who a short time before obtained a feat in parliament. Inflead of flanding forth a firm advocate for the country which gave him birth, he officiously proposed to the house. laying a tax on the colonies, that fhould annually amount to five hundred thousand pounds sterling, which he declared they were well able to pay: and he was heard with great joy and attention t. He or some other recollecting that the stamp-act was talked of by the commissioners at Albany, in 1754, might suggest that mode of taxing, for whatever was thought, the stamp-act was not originally Mr. Grenville's t.

The disposition to tax the Americans, unless they would tax themselves equal to the wishes of the ministry, was undoubtedly Arengthened by the reports of their gaiety and luxury, which reached the mother country: it was also faid, that the planters lived like princes, while the inhabitants of Britain laboured hard for a tolerable subfishence. The officers lately returned, reprefented them as rich, wealthy, and even overgrown in fortune. Their opinion might arise from observations made in the American cities and towns during the war, while large sums were fpent in the country, for the support of fleets and armies. American productions were then in great demand, and trade flourished. The people, naturally generous and hospitable, having a number of strangers among them, indulged theinselves in many uncommon expences. When the war was terminated, and they had no further apprehension of danger, the power of the late enemy in the country being totally broken—Canada, and the back lands to the very banks of the Miffifippi, with the Floridas, being ceded to Great-Britain-it was thought they could not well make too much of those who had so contributed to their security. Partly to do honor to them, and partly, it is to be feared, to gratify their own pride, they added to their show of plate, by borrowing of their neighbours, and made a great parade of riches in their feveral entertainments. The plenty and variety of provision and liquors, enabled them to furnish out an elegant

Mr. Grenville's intended stamp-act was communicated to the American agents. Many of them did not oppose it. Half their number were placemen, or dependent on the ministry. Mr. 70feph Sherwood, an honest quaker, agent for Rhode-Island, refused his affent to America's being taxed by a British parliament. Mr. Mauduit, the Maffachufetts agent, favored the raifing of the wanted money by a flamp duty, as it would occasion less expence of officers, and would include the West-India islands. But the scheme was postponed, and the agents authorised to inform the American affemblies, that they were at liberty to fuggest any other way of raifing monies; and that Mr. Grenville was ready to receive proposals for any other tax, that might be equivalent in its produce to the stamp-tax. The colonies feemed to confider it as an affront, rather than a compliment. He would not have been content with any thing short of a certain specific sum, and proper funds for the payment of it. Had not the sums been answerable to his wishes, he would have rejected them; and he would fearce have been fatisfied with lefs than 300,000 l. per annum, which was judged absolutely necessary to defray the whole expence of the army proposed for the defence of America: he might rather have expected that it should amount to what Mr. Hufke had mentioned. No fatisfactory proposals being made, he adhered to his purpose of bringing forward the stamp-bill, though repeatedly pressed by some of his friends to desist, while he might have done it with honor. Richard, Jackson, esq; had been chosen agent for the Massachusetts; he with Mr. Ingerfold,

Mr. Garth, and Mr. Franklin, lately come from Philadelphia, waited on Mr. Grenville, the fecond of February, 1765, by defire of the colonial agents, to remonstrate against the stamp-bill, and to propose that in case any tax must be laid upon America, the several colonies might be permitted to lay the tax themselves. At this interview, Mr. Jackson opened his mind freely on the subject; and Mr. Franklin, as must be supposed, mentioned that he had it in instruction from the assembly of Pennsylvania, to assure the ministry, that they should alway think it their duty to grant such aids to the crown, as were suitable to their circumstances, whenever called for in the usual constitutional manner. Mr. Grenville, however, pertinaciously adhered to his own opinions: and said, that he had pledged his word for offering the stamp-bill to the house, and that the house would hear their objections, &c. &c.

The bill was brought in; and on the first reading, Mr. Charles Townsend spoke in its savor. He took notice of several things that colonel Barre had said in his speech against it; and then concluded with the following or like words: "And now will these Americans, children planted by our care; nourished up by our indulgence, until they are grown to a degree of strength and opulence; and protested by our arms; will they grudge to contribute their mite, to relieve us from the heavy weight of that burden which we lie under?"

On this colonel Barre rofe, and after explaining fome paffages in his speech, took up Mr. Townsend's concluding words in a most spirited and inimitable manner, saying, "They flanted by YOUR care! No, your oppressions planted them in America. They fled from your tyranny, to a then uncultivated and unhofpitable country, where they exposed themselves to almost all the hardfhips to which human nature is liable; and among others, to the cruelties of a favage foe, the most subtle, and I will take upon me to fay, the most formidable of any people upon the face of God's earth; and vet, actuated by principles of true English liberty, they met all hardships with pleasure, compared with those they fuffered in their own country, from the hands of those that should have been their friends.—They nourished up by YOUR indulgence! They grew by your neglect of them. As foon as you began to care about them, that care was exercifed in fending persons to rule them, in one department and another, who were, perhaps, the deputies of deputies to some members of this house, fent to spy out their liberties, to misrepresent their actions, and to pry upon them-men, whose behaviour on many occasions, has caused the blood of those fons of liberty to recoil within them—men promoted to the highest seats of justice; some who to my knowledge were glad, by going to a foreign country, to escape being brought to the bar of a court of justice in their own. .- They protected by YOUR arms! They have nobly taken up arms in your defence; have exerted a valor, amidst their constant and laborious industry, for the defence of a country, whose frontier was drenched in blood, while its interior parts yielded all its little favings to your emolument.—And believe me, remember I this day told you fo, that fame spirit of freedom, which actuated that people at first, will accompany them still-but prudence forbids me to explain myfelf further .- God knows, I do not at this time fpeak from motives of party heat; what I deliver are the genuine fentiments of my heart. However fuperior to me in general knowledge and experience the respectable body of this house may be, yet I claim to know more of America than most of you, having seen and been conversant in that country.—The people, I believe, are as truly loyal as any fubjects the king has; but a people jealous of their liberties, and who will vindicate them, if ever they should be violated-but the fubject is too delicate—I will fay no more." These sentiments were thrown out, fo entirely without premeditation, fo forcibly and fo firmly; and the breaking off was fo beautifully abrupt, that the whole house fat awhile amazed, intently looking without answering a word.

The London merchants trading to America, being much alarmed on account of their outstanding debts, petitioned against the stamp-act. Their petition was offered at the fecond reading of the bill. The rule of the house, never to receive petitions against money bills, was urged. General Conway observed, that it appeared undeniable, that the practice was by no means invariable; at best it was but a practice of convenience, from which they ought, in the present instance, to vary. The ministry publicly declared, " That it was intended to establish the power of Great-Britain to tax the colonies." They were induced to make a point of it, because most of the petitions from thence, denied in the strongest terms, the right of Britain to impose taxes. It was evident that the ministerial forces would prevail, the petition of the London merchants was therefore withdrawn. After that, the others from the colonies were offered, but rejected upon the plea taken from the rule of the house. During the debate upon the bill, in this stage of it, "general Conway denied the right of parliament to tax the Americans, in the most peremptory manner; and urged, with great vehemence, the many hardihips, and what he was pleafed to call, abfurdities that would follow from the contrary doctrine and practice "." Alderman Beckford alfo disputed the right of parliament, according to Mr. Ingerfoll's letter.

The supporters of the stamp-act insisted much upon the colonies being virtually represented; and mentioned Leeds, Halifax, Birmingham, Manchester, &c. as enjoying a virtual representation. Whoever had a recourse to a virtual representation of the colonies, in vindication of the parliament's taxing them, therein acknowledged, that there ought not to be taxation without reprefentation. But the difference between Leeds, Halifax, &c. and the American colonies, is as wide as the Atlantic. The landholders of those towns enjoy a real representation, if their freeholds yield a certain annual income. Many of the inhabitants have a choice in the election of members, in one place or another. The general interests of the freeholders and tenants, electors and non-electors, are fo interwoven, that all are liable to be equally affected by the fame common taxes. The one pays the same duty on his fugar, tea, coffee, and chocolate, as the other. The relative connection between them, produces what may be called, with a kind of propriety, a virtual representation; answering, though in a lower degree, to what the family of a freeholder or freeman enjoys. But was all the foil in the British colonies a man's freehold, it would not give him a fingle vote for any one member of parliament. There is not an individual in them, who, should he cross the Atlantic, would have a right to vote in any election, by virtue of any privileges enjoyed in America. He must be a freeholder of Britain, or a freeman of some British city, borough, or corporation, and have a British qualification, before he can elect or be elected. The interests of America and Britain are not interwoven, as are those of British electors and non-electors. If the British parliament impose taxes on the Americans, Britons do not bear with them, their part and proportion in the faid taxes. The former are burdened, that the latter may be eafed. The monies raifed have the nature of a tribute, exacted from a conquered people in a flavish dependence; and not of a tax voluntarily granted by the voice of freemen, through their own elected reprefentatives, paying fcot and lot with themselves for the support of government. Beside, the British parliament are so far removed from America, that they cannot obtain that full information respecting the colonics, which ought alway to accompany the exercise of a taxing power.

When the question upon the bill, in its last stage, was brought to a vote, there were about 250 for, and 50 against it. In the house of lords, so strong was the unanimity, that there was not a single syllable uttered against the bill; and on the twenty-second of March, it obtained the royal affent. The night after it was passed.

Dr. Franklin wrote Mr. Charles Thomson*, "the fun of liberty is fet; you must light up the candles of industry and economy." Mr. Thomson answered, he was apprehensive that other lights would be the consequence, and predicted the opposition that followed.

The framers of the stamp-act flattered themselves, that the confusion which would arise upon the disuse of writings, would compel the colonies to use the stamp-paper, and therefore to pay the taxes imposed. Thus they were led to pronounce it, a law which would execute itself. Mr. Grenville however appears to have been apprehensive, that it might occasion disorders; to prevent or suppress which, he projected another bill, which was brought in the fame fession, whereby it was to be made lawful for military officers in the colonies, to quarter their foldiers in private houses. This seemed intended to awe the people into a compliance with the other act. Great opposition being made to it, as under fuch a power in the army, no one could look on his house as his own, that part of the bill was dropt; but there still remained a claufe, when it passed into a law, to oblige the several affemblies to provide quarters for the foldiers, and to furnish them with firing, bedding, candles, finall beer, rum, and fundry other articles; at the expence of the feveral provinces; which continued in force when the stamp-act was repealed. It equally militated with the other against the American principle, That money is not to be raifed on English subjects without their confent.

Whatever might be urged, government was under no neceffity of adopting the mode of taxing the colonies for their defence, and the fecuring of the new ceded countries. Though after the general peace, an Indian war might be continued or renewed. that was no reason for continuing British forces in America. The colonists were better able to deal with them than the regulars. The new ceded countries required no great number of troops to fecure them. The colonies were at hand to support the British garrisons in case assistance was wanted; and they had repeatedly shewed their readiness upon former occasions.— The idea of a dangerous enemy upon the American continent was at an end: and the British administration must have been inexcufable, had they not guarded against the transferring of one from Europe. It was become futile to exclaim-" Shall it depend upon the resolutions of a Philadelphia affembly, whether our fellow subjects shall arm in defence of liberty and property? Does the fate of a whole continent bear any proportion to an almost imperceptible encroachment upon the important privilege of an American, deliberating for a year or two, whether he will pay fix-pence in the pound to fave himfelf and family from perdition?" The danger of perdition was a mere bugbear, which might frighten the ignorant into an apprehension, that it was abfolutely necessary to maintain an army in America, for the expence of which the colonies should be made to answer: but the Americans knew better than to flartle at the spectre. Had no more troops been stationed upon the American continent than circumstances called for, the ministry might have obtained all the aids it was reasonable for the colonies to have given, by the old mode of requisition. From the time that they were first confidered as capable of granting aids, the constant mode of obtaining them, was by requisition from the crown, through the governors to the feveral affemblies: and the ministers, from Charles II. to the prefent king, most effectually recognised the distinction between parliamentary superintendence and taxation, in their requisitions to the colonies to raise men and money by acts of affembly. Had this happy method been continued, all the money that could have been justly expected from them in any manner, might have been procured without the least breach of that harmony, which fo long fubfifted between the colonies and the mother country: and it was not acting wifely to thwart unnecessarily the prejudices of the Americans. But the imposition of taxes upon them might be introductory to, or a part of the plan for overturning their civil and religious liberties, alluded to by the Reverend Mr. Whitefield, before even the fugar-act had passed.

. The stamp-act having passed, the colony agents waited upon Mr. Wheatley by defire, who told them, that Mr. Grenville did not think of fending from Great Britain stamp officers, but wished to have discreet and respectable persons appointed from among the inhabitants; and that he would be obliged to them to point out to him fuch perfons. Thus the agents were drawn in to nominate. Dr. Franklin recommended Mr. Hughes to be , chief distributor of stamps in Pennsylvania, and Mr. Cox in the Ferseys; and being consulted by Mr. Ingersoil, advised him to accept, adding, go home and tell your countrymen to get children as fast as they can—thereby intimating his opinion of the oppression the colonists were under, and of their present inability to make effectual refistance; but that they ought, when sufficiently numerous, to shake off the yoke and recover their liberty. It is apparent from the recommendations, and the appointments made in confequence of the nominations, that the agents were far from thinking, that fuch diflurbances would have been occasioned by the stamp-act, or they would have spared their friends. They certainly expected the act would have gone down.

down, and the stamp-papers have been used. But it was he reverfe.

· A general discontent through the Massachusetts discovered itfelf immediately on the first advice of the acts having passed; but there was no other expectation among the bulk of the people, than that the act would be submitted to, and the duty paid; and feveral who afterward opposed it violently, made interest with the distributor, that they or their friends might obtain appointments. The newspapers indeed, groaned for the lofs of liberty; however, nothing extravagant appeared in them: but the friends to the claims of the colonies, pleafed with Barre's speech, and what he had pronounced the Americans, assumed to themselves the title of—SONS OF LIBERTY.

In Connecticut, the inhabitants were quite inattentive to the fatal consequences that the act might draw after it in some diftant period. The judges themselves, several of whom were of the council, appeared perfectly fecure, and were no ways alarmed. The Rev. Mr. Stephen Johnson of Lyme, vexed and grieved with the temper and inconsiderateness of all orders of people, determined if possible to rouse them to a better way of thinking. He confulted a neighbouring gentleman, an Irilhman by birth, who undertook to convey the pieces he might pen to the New London printer, fo fecretly as to prevent the author's being difcovered. Three or four effays were published upon the occasion. The eyes of the public began to open, and fears were excited. Other writers engaged in the business, while the first withdrew, having fully answered his intention. The congregational ministers saw further into the designs of the British administration than the bulk of the colony; and by their publications and conversation, increased and strengthened the opposition.-It became fo confiderable, that when governor Fitch proposed that he and the counsellors should be sworn agreeable to the stamp-act, colonel Trumbull* went out and refused even to witnels to the transaction. Others followed this spirited example, and only four of the council remained.

In Virginia a general disposition appeared to submit to the stamp-act: but George Johnston and Patrick Henry, efgrs. confulted together; and afterward, at the close of the fessions, when there was but a thin house, many members being absent preparing to return home, Mr. Henry brought in a number of refolves.-They were as follows, viz. "Whereas the honorable house of commons in England, have of late drawn into question how far the general affembly of this colony bath power to enact laws for laying of taxes and imposing duties, payable by the people of this his majesty's most ancient colony—for settling and ascertaining · VOL. the same to all future times, the house of burgesses of this prefent general assembly, have come to the following resolves:

Refolved, That the first adventurers, settlers of this his majesty's colony and dominion of Virginia, brought with them and transmitted to their posterity, and all other his majesty's subjects since inhabiting in this his majesty's said colony, all the liberties, privileges, franchises, and immunities, that have at any time been held, enjoyed and possessed by the people of Great-Britain:

Refolved, That by two royal charters, granted by king James I. the colonists aforesaid are declared and entitled to all liberties, privileges and immunities of denizens and natural subjects, to all intents and purposes, as if they had been abiding and born within the realm of England:

Refolved, That his majesty's liege people of this ancient colony have enjoyed the right of being thus governed by their own assembly, in the articles of taxes and internal police; and that the same have never been forfeited, or any other way yielded up, but have been constantly recognised by the king and people of Britain:

Refolved, therefore, That the general affembly of this colony, together with his majefty or his fubflitutes, have in their reprefentative capacity, the only exclusive right and power to lay taxes and imposts upon the inhabitants of this colony; and that every attempt to vest such power in any other person or persons whatsoever, than the general affembly aforesaid, is illegal, unconstitutional, and unjust, and hath a manifest tendency to destroy British as well as American liberty:

Refolved, That his majesty's liege people, the inhabitants of this colony, are not bound to yield obedience to any law or ordinance whatever, defigned to impose any taxation whatsoever upon them, other than the laws or ordinances of the general as-

fembly aforefaid:

Resolved, That any person who shall, by speaking or writing, affert or maintain, that any person or persons, other than the general affembly of this colony, have any right or power to impose or lay any taxation on the people here, shall be deemed an enemy to this his majesty's colony."

Upon reading these resolves, the Scotch gentlemen in the house, cried out treason, &c. They were however adopted.—The next day, some old members got them revised, though they could not carry it to reject them. As revised they stand thus on the printed journals of the house of burgesses.

Thursday, May 30, 1765.

Refolved, That the first adventurers, &c. &c. as above :

Refolved, That by two royal charters, &c..&c. Refolved, That the taxation of the people by themselves, or by persons chosen by themselves to represent them, who can only know what taxes the people are able to bear, or the cafiest method of raising them, and must themselves be effected by every tax laid on the people, is the only fecurity against a burdensome taxation, and the distinguishing characteristic of British freedom; without which the ancient constitution cannot exist:

Refolved, That his majesty's liege people of this his most ancient and loyal colony have, without interruption, enjoyed the inestimable right of being governed by fuch laws, respecting their internal polity and taxation, as are derived from their own confent, with the approbation of their fovereign or his substitute; and that the fame hath never been forfeited or yielded up, but hath been constantly recognised by the kings and people of Great- Britain."

[June 1.] Lieutenant governor Farquier diffolved the house of burgeffes upon being made acquainted with their refolves.

A manuscript of the unrevised resolves soon reached Philadelphia, having been fent off immediately upon their passing, that the earliest information of what had been done might be obtained by the fons of liberty. From thence the like was forwarded on the seventeenth of June. At New-York the resolves were handed about with great privacy: they were accounted fo treafonable, that the possessors of them declined printing them in that city. The Irish gentleman alluded to above, being there, inquired after them, and with much precaution was admitted to take a copy. He carried them to New-England, where they were published and circulated far and wide in the newspapers, without any referve, and proved eventually the occasion of those disorders which afterward broke out in the colonies. Till they appeared, it was thought that the Rhode-Islanders would submit. Murmurs indeed were continually heard; but they feemed to be fuch as would die away. The Virginia refolutions gave a spring to all the difgusted; and they began to adopt different measures.

The Maffachufetts affembly had hit upon a wife and quiet mode of feeking redrefs, before ever they could be acquainted with what had been done in Virginia. It was projected and brought on by Mesfrs. Otis, father and son. They were visiting at James Warren's efq; of Plymouth, a fon and brother in law, he having married Miss Otis. The state of public affairs, and how to get rid of the burdens coming upon the colonies, were the

fubjects of conversation. Congresses had often been held, and though there was no precedent of any one's being called, but at the instance of persons authorized or employed by the ministry, excepting the first congress we read of, which was proposed by the Massachusetts general court in 1690; yet no reasonable objection could be made against holding one upon the present emergency, notwithstanding it might want the fanction of administration. It was agreed to forward the meeting of a congress as a proper method for obtaining the removal of American grievances. The matter was moved in the house of affembly; [June 6. | the confequence was, an agreement, that "It is highly expedient, there thould be a meeting, as foon as may be, of committees from the houses of representatives or burgesses in the several colonies, to confult on the present circumstances of the colonies, and the difficulties to which they are and must be reduced, and to confider of a general address-to be held at New-York the first Tuesday of October." Within two days, a letter was drafted to be fent to the feveral speakers; and at the close of a fortnight, Fames Otis, jun. Oliver Partridge, and Timothy Ruggles, efgrs. were chosen the committee for the Massachusetts. The governor, in his account to the lords of trade, faid, "It was impoffible to oppose this measure to any good purpose; and therefore the friends of government took the lead in it, and have kept it in their hands. Two of the three chosen are fast friends to government, prudent and discreet men, such as I am assured will never confent to any improper applications to the government of Great-Britain." Lieutenant governor Colden designedly prorogued the meeting of the New-York affembly, till after the time appointed for the congress; but the committee ordered, by the vote of the house of the eighteenth of October 1764, to be a committee during the recels, to write to and correspond with the feveral affemblies or committees of affemblies on the continent, did by virtue of that order, meet in congress; and the house afterward approved of their conduct, on the twentieth of November; and moreover refolved, "that for the obtaining relief from the operation and execution of the stamp-act, and other acts for levying duties and taxes on the colonies, humble petitions be prepared to the king, the house of lords, and the flouse of commons, as nearly similar to those drawn up by the congress as the particular circumstances of the colony will admit."

The affemblies of Virginia, North-Corolina, and Georgia were prevented, by their governors, having the opportunity of fending committees to congress. The Maffachufetts-Bay, Rhode-If-tund and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New-York, New-

ForFy.

Fersey, Pennsylvania, the Delaware Counties, and South-Carolina. had their respective committees present at the place appointed; and Mr. Ruggles was chosen chairman. The petition to the house of commons being finished, was signed; though only by members from fix colonies; the committees from Connecticut. New-York, and South-Carolina, not having been fufficiently empowered. Mr. Ruggles took leave of the members, Thursday evening the twenty-fourth of October, and came off the next morning without figning; for which he was afterward cenfured by the Maffachusetts affembly. Mr. Otis was upon the point of trespassing in like manner; but was prevented by the influence of Mr. Thomas Lynch, of the South-Carolina committee. The congress dissolved on October the twenty-fifth, having finished the business, to which they had been appointed. The colonies that could not fend committees, showed, as opportunities offered, their approbation of what had been done, by forwarding to their agents petitions to the like purpose with that of congress. New-Hampshire had excused their not sending to Congress, from the then lituation of their governmental affairs; but the speaker laying before the affembly the proceedings of Congress, on November the twenty-fecond, they voted unanimously, "That this house do fully approve of and heartily join in the resolves and several petitions agreed to by the faid general congress; and that the speaker, with two others (all whose names are mentioned) be empowered to fign the same in behalf of this house, if not too late; if the general petitions are forwarded, in that case the said petitions to be fairly engroffed, that they fign them in behalf of the house, and forward them with duplicates to Barlow Trecothick and John Wentworth, efgrs. who are appointed special agents for the house, and are empowered and defired to present the faid petitions, &c." The committee wrote to these agents, on December the fixth, and concluded with faying, "We in this province have not been so boisterous and irregular as some others, not because we were insensible of our distresses; but because we thought the present method most likely to obtain relief."

The Virginia refolves having had their full operation, and the fpirits of the people being highly inflamed, the colonial diffurbances break out upon the following occasion. Messis. John Avery, jun. Thomas Crasts, John Smith, Henry Welles, Thomas Chace, Stephen Cleverly, Henry Bass, and Benjamin Edes, to manifest their abhorrence and detestation of those persons, who they supposed were endeavouring to subvert the British constitution, to enslave the colonies, and to alienate the affections of his majesty's most faithful subjects in America, provide and hang out early in the morning of Angust the fourteenth, upon the limb of a large old elm, toward the entrance of Boston, over the most public street, two esfigies, one of which by the labels. appears to be defigned for the flamp officer; the other is a jack boot, with a head and horns peeping out of the top. Not only the usual passengers pass under it, but the report spreads and draws great numbers from every part of the town, and the neighbouring country. The affair is left to take its own course, an enthusiastic spirit diffuses itself through the body of the spectators. In the evening the pageantry is cut down, and carried in funeral procession, the populace shouting, liberty and property for ever, no flamps, &c. &c. They direct their way to a new building, lately erected by Mr. Oliver, which they pull down, falfely fuppoling it to be defigned for the stamp-office. They go on to his house, before which they behead his effigy, breaking at the same time all the windows next the street. They then repair to Fort Hill, on the afcent to which stands his house, where they burn his effigy. After this they return to attack his premifes; and many of them with clubs, staves, &c. go to work on the garden, fences, barns, &c. Mr. Oliver had prudently retired, leaving a few friends behind to keep possession of the dwelling: these committed fome-flight indifcretions, the populace are fo enraged, that they force themselves into the lower part of it, break the windows and destroy the furniture. They disperse about midnight. The next day, [August 15.] Mr. Oliver, fearful of what may otherwife happen, declares that he has written to England, and refigned. The mob affemble again at night: and, after some expressions of joy for the resignation, proceed to the lieutenant-governor's, Mr. Hutchinfon's house, which they befiege for an hour, though in vain, infifting repeatedly upon knowing whether he had not written in favour of the stamp-act: at length, through the influence of fome different persons, they withdraw, and finish their evening's entertainment at a bonfire.

[August 26.] Eleven days after, the diforders grow more enormous and alarming. In the evening a number of persons, disguised and armed with clubs, slicks, &c. collect in King-street, in consequence of a preconcerted plan. They go first to Mr. Paxton's, marshal of the court of admiralty and surveyor of the port; being assured by the owner of the house, that Mr. Paxton had quitted it with his best effects; and being invited by him to the tavern to drink a barrel of punch, they accept the offer, and the house is saved. Haying sinished the punch, they proceed to and attack the house of Mr. William Story, deputy register of the court of admiralty; break the windows; force into the dwelling; strip the office of the books and files belonging to the said court; burn and desiroy them with many other papers; injure

It is the opinion of fome, that the first movers in the affair meant mainly an affault upon the house of the deputy register, who, by various mal-practices, had made himself highly obnoxious to persons doing business at his office. But mobs once raised, soon become ungovernable by new and large accessions, and extend their intentions far beyond those of the original instigators. Crafty men may intermix with them, when they are much heated, and direct their operations quite differently from what was at first designed.

How far the scheme of the present mob extended, when it first collected, is hard to say; but upon leaving Mr. Story's, they proceed to the house of Mr. Benj. Hallowell, comptroller of the customs for Boston; and to the repetition of similiar excesses to what have been just committed, add the drinking and destroying of liquors in the cellars, the taking away of wearing apparel, the breaking open of desk and drawers, and the carrying off of thirty pounds fterling in money. Many being now inflamed with liquor, and numbers having joined them, they become more ri-otous, and are ready for any mischief. They hurry away to Mr. Hutchinson's house with the rage of madmen. He sends off his children; bars his doors and windows; and means to remain; but is foon under the necessity of withdrawing, first to one house, then to another, where he continues till four in the morning; by which time, one of the best sinished houses in the colony has nothing remaining but the bare walls and floors. Gentlemen of the army, who have feen towns facked by an enemy, declare they never before faw an instance of such fury. The rioters carry off about nine hundred pounds sterling, beside plate, family pictures, houshold furniture of every kind, and the apparel of the lieutenant governor, his children and fervants.-They also empty the house of every thing whatsoever, except a part of the kitchen furniture; and scatter or destroy all the manuscripts and other papers he has been collecting for thirty years back, besides a great number of public papers in his custody.--The loss of papers is irreparable.

[Aug. 27.] The next day it was strongly reported, by the enemies of Dr. Jonathan Mayhew, that he approved of these doings; and had, indeed, encouraged them, in a sermon preached the preceding Lord's day, on Gal. v. 12, 13. This led him to write immediately to Hutchinson; and in his letter he condoled with him, "on account of the almost unparalleled outrages, committed at his house the preceding evening;" and said, "God is my witness, that, from the bottom of my heart, I detest these proceedings; and that I am sincerely grieved for them, and have a deep sympathy with you, and your distressed family on this occasion. I did, indeed, express myself strongly, in favor of civil and religious liberty, as I hope I shall ever continue to do; and spoke of the stamp-act as a great grievance, like to prove detrimental, in a high degree, both to the colonies and the mother country; and I have heard your honor speak to the same purpose. But, as my text led me to do, I cautioned my hearers very particularly, against the abuses of liberty; and expressed my hopes, that no persons among ourselves had encouraged the bringing of such a burden on their country, notwithstanding it had been strongly suspected. In truth, Sir, I had rather lose my hand, than be an encourager of such outrages as were committed last night. I do not think my regard to truth was ever called into question, by those that knew me; and therefore hope your honor will be so just as to give entire credit to these solemn declarations."

This fame day the superior court began its term. The chief justice, Mr. Hutchinson, attended in his only suit, and necessarily without those ensigns of office, so wifely calculated to procure regard to authority; while the other gentlemen of the bench and bar appeared in their respective robes. The court refused to do any business, and adjourned to the fifteenth of October, to show their refentment of the infult offered the lieutenant-governor as well as their fense of the anarchy to which the government was reduced. Half a dozen of the dregs of the people, who, being taken up, refused to discover the ringleaders, were committed. • Three broke jail and fled, against one of whom a bill was found: against the other three in custody none was found; for it was not thought fafe to profecute. The temper of the public would not admit of it, without hazarding further disturbances; and for that reason, one, who was capitally charged with being a principal in the riot, and fecured, was finally difinified by the juftices.

Various causes might contribute toward the outrageous attack upon the house and property of Mr. Hutchinson. As long back as 1748, the currency having depreciated to about an eighth of its original value, he, being then speaker of the house, projected and carried through a bill for abolishing it, and substituting gold and filver in its place, which made him extremely obnoxious to several, who had lived by fraud, and were much distaissified with the alteration. They then threatened him with destruction; and, retaining their rancour, are supposed to have been aiders and abettors, if not afters in the riot.—A certain gentleman of great integrity, and who sills a place in the judicial department, with much credit and to the satisfaction of the public, has expressed a strong apprehension, that the mob was led on to the house, by a fecret influence, with a view to the destruction of certain papers, known to be there, and which, it is thought, would have proved, that the grant to the New-Plymouth company on Kennebec river, was different from what was contended for by some claimants. The papers were never found afterward.—But Mr. Hutchinson had certainly disgusted the people exceedingly, by promoting the superior court's granting writs of affistance; and by showing himself so strenuous in supporting government, when become odious, by the measures adopted for obliging the colonies to pay taxes in compliance with British acts of parliament.—He was also strongly suspected of having forwarded the stamp-act, by letters written upon the occasion. These circumstances, co-operating with the general disposition in the people to tumult, produced by a prevailing perfuafion, that they were deprived of the liberties of Englishmen, will account for the excessive outrages against him in particular. But their enormity was alarming. No one knew who might be the next facrifice. The town of Boston therefore, beside condemning them the next day, unanimously voted, "That the felect men and magistrates be defired to use their utmost endeavours to suppress the like disorders for the future:" and for some time, the magistrates and private gentlemen, the cadet and other companies, kept watch at night to prevent further violences.

In justice to Mr. Hutchinson, it must be observed, that from his letters to Messrs. Bollan, Jackson, and others, it appears, that he then considered parliament's taxing the colonies as inconsistent with the rights of the colonists, and as a mere act of power, without regard to equity. He was at the trouble of writing a pamphlet in 1764, containing A brief slate of the claim of the colonies, and the interest of the nation with respect to them. This, when he had disguised it so as that it might not be suspected to come from America, he sent to Mr. Jackson the agent, who was either to suppress or publish it; and he afterward expressed a surprise at his not having done the latter. The following are

"The right to new acquired countries, according to the conflitution of England, two hundred years ago, was allowed to be in the crown. The crown from time to time disposed of these countries, not only to their own subjects, but to foreign princes: particularly Acadia and Nova-Scotia, when begun to be set, tled by British subjects, were ceded to France, although France had no better claim to them than to New-England: and Surinam was sold to, or exchanged with the Dutch." He might have adduced in proof of James I. being of opinion, that he had a perfonal right to alienate at pleasure new acquired territory, his Vol. I.

granting, in September 1621, Nova-Scotia, which he could not inherit but as king of England, to Sir William Alexander, of Men. stry, afterward Lord Stirling, under the seal of Scotland; and his erecting it into a palatinate, to be holden as a fief of the crown of Scotland. Under the same seal, and in the same words, the grant was confirmed by Charles I. in June 1625. The legality of these grants appear not to have been questioned at the time, which indicates that the prevailing opinion of the English corresponded then with that of their fovereigns.

Mr. Hutchinson goes on to mention, "American lands in their natural flate are of no value: there is not any colony which has not cost more to make it capable of rendering profit than it is now worth."

" In the trading towns, in some of the colonies the last war, one fourth part of the profit of the trade was annually paid to the support of the war, and other public charges. In the country towns, a farm which would not rent for twenty pounds a year, paid ten pounds taxes. Was it from parental affection to the colonifis, and to fave them from French vaffalage, that Great-Britain was at fuch expence; or was it from fear of losing the advantageous trade the had carried on with her colonies?"

"When there is peace in Europe, what occasion is there for any national expence in America?"

"It cannot be good policy to tax the Americans; it will prove prejudicial to the national interests. The advantages proposed by the increase of the revenue, are fallacious and delusive. You will lofe more than you will gain. Britain reaps the profit of all their trade, and of the increase of their substance."

"Your commerce with the colonies will be enough for you, should you have no commerce elsewhere, if you encourage the colonies to increase the confumption of your manufactures for fifty years to come, as they have done for fifty years past; and with no more than reasonable encouragement they will infallibly do it, and in much greater proportion."

Though the disturbances began in Boston, yet they were not confined to the Maffachusetts. They broke out in the other colonies; and so near to the fame time, as to excite suspicions, that it was not wholly the effect of accident, but partly of a preconcerted design. Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations showed themselves among the foremost in their opposition to the Hamp-act.

[Aug. 24.] A gazette extraordinary was published at Providence, with Vox populi, Vox Dei, in large letters for the frontifpiece; and underneath, Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. The publication had a tendency to prepare the people for action. Effigies were also exhibited; and in the evening, cut down and burnt by the populace.

[27.] About nine in the morning, the people of Newport, in Rhode-Island, brought forth three effigies, meant for Messers. Howard, Mosfatt, and Johnson, in a cart with halters about their necks, to a gallows near the town-house, where they were hung; after a while cut down, and burnt amid the acclamations of thousands.

[28.] By the next day there was time enough to hear of what had been done at Boston. The people collected, or rather were mustered afresh, and besat the house of Mr. Martin Howard, jun. a lawyer of reputation, and a writer in defence of the parliament's right to tax the colonies. They destroyed every thing, and left only a shell. They passed on to Dr. Thomas Moffatt's, a physician, one who had warmly supported in conversation the same right, and behaved in like manner. They intended doing it to Mr. Augustus Johnson, but desisted upon persuasion; and on his coming to town, and giving it under his hand that he would not accept the office of distributor of the stamps, unless the public were satisfied, they became quiet. Messrs. Howard and Mossatt hastened on board a ship of war for personal safety.

The commotions in Connecticut were not equally violent: but Mr. Ingerfoll was the fubject of exhibition in divers places.

[Aug. 22.] They had their pageantry at Norwich, which they committed to the flames, when the day closed.

[26.] They had the fame at Lebanon; but before they executed and burnt, they had the parade of a mock trial.

[27.] The next day there was a repetition of the like, excepting the trial. At length the refertment against the stamp, distributor became so general and alarming, that he resigned his office.

A like refignation takes place in New-York, fome time in August. It becomes a necessary point of prudence, from the spirit which the citizens discover. The stamp-act is treated with the most indignant contempt, by being printed and cried about the streets, under the title of, The folly of England, and ruin of America. Toward the end of October the stamp-papers arrive; and Mr. M'Evers having resigned, lieutenant-governor Colden takes them into Fort George. Some extraordinary preparations for securing them having displeased the inhabitants, joined to the dissilate they have entertained to Colden's political sentiments, [Nov. 1.] and its being the day for the stamp-act to take place, numbers are induced to assemble in the evening. They proceed to the fort walls; break open his stable; take out his coach; and, after carrying it through the principal streets of the city in triumph, march to the common, where a gallows is erected; on one end of which they suspend his essign, having in his right hand a stamped bill of lading, and in the other, a sigure for the devil. After hanging a considerable time, they carry the whole, with the gallows intire, the coach preceding, in procession to the gate of the fort; from whence it is removed to the bowling-green, under the muzzels of the guns; where a bonfire is immediately made, and all, coach included, are consumed amid the exultations of some thousands of spectators. They go from hence to major James's house, before known by the name of Vaux-hall, which is genteely furnished; contains a valuable library and many curiosities, and has a handsome garden belonging to it. They stript it of every article, make another bonfire, and consume the whole, beside destroying the garden; and all because of his being a friend to the stamp-act.

Nov. 2. The next morning a paper is privately drawn up, and given to a man to read from the balcony of the coffee-house, to and about which the citizens are used to frequent: it sets forth the necessity of being peaceable, and calls upon the inhabitants to turn out with their arms upon any alarm, and quell all riotous proceedings. The effect it appears to have upon being heard, is frustrated by captain Isaac Sears, who formerly commanded a privateer, and is bitterly fet against the stamp-act. Having been fecretly informed in the morning what is to be done, he is prefent, and tells the populace, who collect about him, "The intention of the proposal that has been read, is to prevent our having the stamp papers;" and adds, "but we will have them within four and twenty hours." He then flourishes his hat, and cries, "Huzza, my lads." They immediately comply in loud fhouts. He turns to feveral gentlemen present, and fays, "Your best way, as you may now fee, will be to advise lieutenant-governor Colden to fend the stamp-papers from the fort to the inhabitants." In the evening the mob affemble, and infift upon his delivering them into their hands. He hopes to fatisfy them, by declaring he will do nothing in relation to the stamps, but leave it to Sir Henry Moore to do as he pleases on his arrival. The people are not contented; they will have the flamps, or attempt taking them away by force; which must probably be attended with much bloodshed. After repeated negociation, it is agreed, that they thall be delivered to the corporation; which is accordingly done, and they are deposited in the city-hall, to general satisfaction. Ten boxes of the like, which arrive afterward, meet with a worse fate, being committed to the flames. The

The destruction of major James's house, (for it was reduced to a shell) convinced the gentlemen who were standing up for the rights of the colonies, that it was necessary to have leaders to manage the mob. It was therefore contrived to call the people together.

[Nov. 6.] They met in the fields; and it was proposed, that a committee be appointed to open a correspondence with the other colonies. This was a measure of so ferious and important a nature, as to endanger the property and lives of the committee, especially should the stamp-act be enforced and carried through; and therefore there was no one, for more than half an hour, who would venture to accept. Mr. James De Lancey, who had joined the popular side, in order to secure a seat in the assembly at the next general election, was nominated; but declined, pleading his being upon the committee to converse with the lawyers, on their proceeding to business without stamps, instead of suspending it, as they appeared to intend. At length, however, captain Sears with four others offered, and were approved.

They agreed among themselves to sign all the letters with their several names, and to open a correspondence with all the colonies. The Philadelphians were requested to forward their enclosed letters to the more southern states, and the Bostonians to forward those for New-Hampshire.

Here we fee another fet of corresponding fons of liberty originated, to strengthen the opposition of the colonies to parliamentary taxation.

The commotions beyond New-York, did not terminate in fimilar excesses to what had happened there, at Newport and Boston; but the exhibition of effigies in the day, the burning them at night, and other marks of displeasure, induced the stamp-officers to resign. Some did it with a better grace than others. Mr. George Mercer distributor for Virginia, arrived in the evening at Williamsburg. The people immediately urged him to resign. The next day he declined acting, in so genteel a manner, that he had the repeated acclamations of all present. At night the town was illuminated, the bells were set a ringing, and all was joy and session.

[Oct. 5.] At Philadelphia, upon the appearance of the ships having on board the stamps, all the vessels in the harbour hoisted their colours half staff high; the bells were mussled and continued to toll till evening; and every countenance added to the marks of sincere mourning. A large number of people, chiefly of the presbyterian persuasion, and of the proprietary party, with William Allen, esq; the chief justice's son at their head, as-

fembled and endeavoured to procure the stamp distributor's refignation. It had been for some time warmly talked of, that he ought to resign. Mr. Hughes was obnoxious to both the presbyterian and the proprietary party; but particularly hateful to the latter, as it was his interest, assiduity, and influence, in the Pennsylvania house of assembly, that enabled the province to send home Dr. Franklin to present their petitions, for a change of government from proprietary to royal—a change highly disagreeable to each party. The body of quakers seemed disposed to pay obedience to the stamp-act, and so did part of the church of England, and of the baptists not under proprietary influence. But no pains were spared to engage the Dutch and lower class of people in the opposition; and though Mr. Hughes held out long*, yet he found it necessary

Mr. Hood, stamp distributor for Maryland, that he might avoid refigning, sted to New-York, and obtained protection in the fort. Upon Sir Henry Moore's arrival he left the fort, and went to Long-Island. A number of the freemen crossed over unexpectedly; surprised him; obliged him to sign a paper, declaring his absolute and final resignation; and then took him before a magistrate, to whom he read the paper, and afterward made oath to the matter therein contained.

At Boston they took care to keep up the spirit of liberty, though they avoided former violences. [Sept. 21.] A new political paper appeared under the significant title of "The Constitutional Courant, containing matters interesting to liberty, and no ways repugnant to loyalty; printed by Andrew Marvel, at the sign of the Bribe refused, on Constitution Hill, North-America." It wore a more significant head piece—a snake cut into eight pieces, the head part having NE, the initials of New-England affixed to it, and the rest the initials of the other colonies to South Carolina inclusive, and in order, NY, NJ, P, M, V, NC, SC.—The device accompanying them was JOIN or DIE.

[Nov. 1.] The morning of the day when the ftamp act took place, was ufhered in with the tolling of bells. The large old elm (which fince the fourteenth of August, when the riots began, had been adorned with an inscription, and obtained the name of liberty tree, as the ground under it had that of liberty hall—and which gave rise to other trees being so called, upon an appropriation to popular purposes by the sons of liberty) was decorated with two effigies. They were cut down at three o'clock, amid the acclamations of thousands; carried about town, then to the gallows upon the Neck; there hung up again; after a while cut down; torn in pieces and scattered. The people repaired home; and the evening passed away quietly. But a transaction took place afterward, not much to the credit of the town.

[Dec. 16.] Mr. Oliver was called upon by a letter from (as it was improperly figned) the true fons of liberty, to make a public refignation of his office on the morrow under liberty tree. He defired a gentleman to interpole, and procure him at least leave to refign at the town-house; but after several consultations, nothing more could be obtained than a promife of having no affront offered, and a proposal to invite the principal persons of the town to accompany him. He was obliged to repair to liberty-tree; there to read his declaration in the prefence of more than two thousand people; and then to swear to it before a justice, on the spot for that purpose. The cool, firm, and judicious sons of liberty, must condemn this procedure toward the secretary, as mean, revengeful and cruel. It was torturing his feelings afresh, as upon a stage, in the most conspicuous manner, after having been terrified into a refignation four months before; and when it might be expected, that the bitterness of the resentment against him was ended.

The opposition to the stamp officers was not confined to the continent. The people of St. Kitts, obliged the distributor and his deputy to refign. Barbadoes submitted to the act. Jamaica in general cleared out with stamps; but King ston, as before, without. Upon the continent, Canada and Halifax submitted.

The general fear that individuals were under, either of diftributing or using stamps, was increased in one government by the following paper, pasted up at the door of every public office, and at the corner of the streets—

Pro Patria.

The first man that either distributes or makes use of stamped paper, let him take care of his house, person, and effects.

Vox Populi.

The public refentment was kept alive and lively by the contemptuous treatment which the stamp-act itself met with, being openly burnt in several places with the effigies of the officers; and by caricatures, pasquinades, puns, bon mots, and such vulgar sayings fitted to the occasion, as being short, could be most easily circulated and retained, while, being extremely expressive, they carried with them the weight of great many arguments.

The refignation of the officers, and the want of perfons, either to undertake the delivery of stamps, or to receive and use them, necessarily laid the colonists under a legal inability for doing business, according to parliamentary law. They however ventured upon it, and risked the consequence. The vessels failed from the ports as before; exceping that, in some instances a certificate was given that the person appointed to distribute stamped papers in the province, refused to deliver them, which certificate being handed by the mafters to the naval officer, they were admitted to give bond in his office, and to pass through the other offices without stamps. The Rhode Island and Providence Plantations kept their courts open the whole time, even when they were fulpended in the other colonies. Toward the end of November, it was agreed in Maryland and Virginia to proceed on business in the usual manner without stamps. In the Massachusetts the popular party fo far prevailed, that the house of affembly refolved, January the twenty-third 1766. " That the shutting up the courts of justice is a very great grievance; and that the judges, juffices, and all other public officers in this province ought to proceed as usual." But when the superior court opened, on the eleventh of March, the parties concerned evaded the profecuting of business. The lawyers in a body waited, as usual, upon the judges, on the first day of the term, before they went into the court. The chief justice, Mr. Hutchinson; not being prefent at this meeting, Mr. Peter Oliver faid he attended according to his duty, and that he understood it would be expected that he and his brethren should proceed in business in defiance of the late act of parliament: fuch proceeding, he added, was contrary to his judgment and opinion; and if he fubmitted to it, it would be only for felf-preservation, as he knew he was in the hands of the populace: he therefore previously protested, that all such acts of his, if they should happen, would be acts under durefs. To which the other judges affenting, it s proposed to each of the lawyers fingly, Do you defire that bufiness should proceed contrary to the act of parliament? Every one of them answered in the negative, even Mr. Otis himself.-But they faid, it would be proper to try a cause or two to quiet the people: accordingly one cause, which had been at iffue before the flamp-act took place, was tried, and all other civil businels was postponed to the middle of April.

Though the violent and righteous proceedings, which have been noticed, were feverely censured by many; and numbers in all the colonies, might feem inclined to submit to the stamp-act, yet the right of imposing it was universally condemned, and the colonial rights as universally acceded to by the most peaceably disposed. The resolutions of the Pennsylvania assembly, which met at Philadelphia in September 1765, were passed nemine contradicente; and left upon their minutes, "as a testimony of the zeal and ardent defire of that house, to preserve their inestimable rights, which as Englishmen they possessed ever since the province was fettled, and to transmit them to their latest posterity." They " refolved, That the only legal representatives of the inhabitants of this province, are the perfons they annually elect to ferve as members of affembly—Refolved therefore, That the taxation of the people of this province by any other persons whatfoever, than fuch their representatives in assembly, is unconstitutional, and subversive of their most valuable rights-Refolved. That the laying of taxes upon the inhabitants of this province, in any other manner, being naturally subversive of public liberty, must, of necessary consequence, be utterly destructive of public happiness "." There might not be so many quakers in the house as usual; the times probably occasioned a larger choice out of other denominations; but there must have been several. and these we find acquiesced. These resolutions are as much opposed to the claims of the British parliament, as are those of the Maffachu/etts affembly, passed October the twenty-ninth. Indeed the latter dwell more upon the unalienable effential rights of mankind, of which these cannot be divested, consistent with the law of God and nature, by any law of fociety; and they evidently mark it out, in their opinion, as one of those rights, that no man can justly take the property of another without his con-They also resolved, that a representation in parliament of the inhabitants of their province, fuch as the fubjects in Britain actually enjoy, is impracticable for the subjects in America +-But both affemblies, though their expressions differed, agreed in resolving, that the extensions of the court of admiralty within the provinces, is a most violent infraction of the right of trials by juries. The resolves of the Maryland and Connecticut assemblies paffed, the one September the twenty-eighth, and the other November the first, breathed the same spirit ‡.

[Oct. 31.] But we have now to attend to a judicious meafure, purfued by the New York merchants, the more effectually to obtain a repeal of the stamp act. They resolved to direct their correspondents not to ship any more goods till it was repealed; and that they would not fell any goods upon commission, which should be shipped from Britain, after the first of January, unless upon that condition. They were the foremost in adopting the non-importation agreement; and recommended the like conduct to the Massachusetts and the neighbouring provin-

[Nov. 7.] The merchants and traders of Philadelphia had a general meeting, and entered into a fimilar agreement. Some quakers, who would not fign the combination, thought it prudent to be governed by the fame refluction; and gave directions that the goods ordered should not be fent, unless the stampact was repealed.

It was not till December the ninth that the merchants and traders of Bofton resolved upon a non-importation. Government may deem such combinations illegal, as they are apt to do all that are opposed to their own measures; but surely the case of communities is bad indeed, if they have not a right voluntatarily to agree among themselves, merely to suspend buying till they can obtain their own terms, when equitable.

The peaceable line purfued in these agreements had not been attended to by all who opposed the stamp-act. They therefore, for their own safety, had a recourse to another, which might have drenched the country with blood, had not the repeal prevented. The way had been prepared by the publication of a system of politics, which appeared originally in the New-York papers, the principal point of which was, that the colonies are no otherwise related to Great-Britain but by having the same king. The essays meant to propagate and support this system made their first appearance in the New-York prints, but most probably some of the manuscripts were sent from Boston. The New-York sons of liberty had, at length, a meeting, wherein they resolved, that they would go to the extremity with lives and fortunes to prevent the stamp-act. This spirit produced the sollowing agreement between them and the sons of liberty in Connecticut:

[Dec. 25.] "Certain reciprocal and mutual agreements, concessions and associations made, concluded and agreed upon by and between the sons of liberty of the colony of New-York of the one part, and the sons of liberty of the colony of Connecticut on the other part, this twenty-sisth day of December, in the fixth year of the reign of our sovereign Lord George the Third, by the grace of God, of Great-Britain, France and Ireland king, desender of the faith, and in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and fixty sive.

"The aforesaid parties taking into their most serious consideration the melancholy and unsettled state of Great-Britain and her North-American colonies, proceeding, as they are fully perfuaded, from a design in her most insidious and inveterate enemies, to alienate the affections of his majesty's most loyal and faithful subjects of North-America from his person and government—Therefore to prevent as much as in us lies the dissolution of so inestimable an union, they do, in the presence of Almighty God, declare that they bear the most unshaken faith and true allegiance to his majefly king George the Third—that they are most affectionately and zealoufly attached to his royal person and family, and are fully determined to the utmost of their power, to maintain and support his crown and dignity, and the succession as by law established; and with the greatest cheerfulnefs they fubmit to his government, according to the known and just principles of the BRITISH CONSTITUTION, which they conceive to be founded on the eternal and immutable principles of justice and equity, and that every attempt to violate or wrest it, or any part of it from them, under whatever pretence, colour or authority, is an heinous fin against God, and the most daring contempt of the people, from whom (under God) all just government springs. From a sacred regard to all which, and a just fense of the impending evils that might befal them, in confequence of fuch a dreadful dissolution, They do hereby voluntarily, and of their own free will, as well for the support of his majesty's just prerogative and the British conflitution as their own mutual fecurity and prefervation, agree and concede to affociate, advise, protect, and defend each other in the peaceable, full and just enjoyment of their inherent and accustomed rights as British subjects of their respective colonies, not in the least defiring any alteration or innovation in the grand bulwark of their liberties and the wisdom of ages, but only to preferve it inviolate from the corrupt hands of its implacable enemies—And whereas a certain pamphlet has appeared in America in the form of an act of parliament, called and known by the name of the Stamp-Act, but has never been legally published or introduced, neither can it, as it would immediately deprive them of the most invaluable part of the British constitution, viz. the trial by juries, and the most just mode of taxation in the world, that is, of taxing themselves, rights that every British subject becomes heir to as foon as born. For the preservation of which, and every part of the British constitution, they do reciprocally resolve and determine to march with the utmost dispatch, at their own proper costs and expence, on the first proper notice, (which must be fignified to them by at least fix of the sons of liberty) with their whole force if required, and it can be spared, to the relief of those that shall, are, or may be in danger from the stamp-act, or its promoters and abettors, or any thing relative to it, on account of any thing that may have been done in oppofition to its obtaining—And they do mutually and most fervently recommend it to each other to be vigilant in watching all those who, from the nature of their offices, vocations or dispositions, may be the most likely to introduce the use of stamped papers. to the total subversion of the British constitution and American liberty; and the fame, when discovered, immediately to advise each other of, let them be of what rank or condition foever; and they do agree, that they will mutually, and to the utmost of their power, by all just ways and means, endeavour to bring all such betravers of their country to the most condign punishment-And further, they do mutually resolve to defend the liberty of the press in their respective colonies from all unlawful violations and impediments whatever, on account of the faid act, as the only means (under divine Providence) of preferving their lives, liberties, and fortunes, and the fame in regard to the judges, clerks, attornies, &c. that shall proceed without any regard to the framp-act, from all pains, fines, mulcis, penalties, or any moleflation whatever-And finally, that they will, to the utmost of their power, endeavour to bring about, accomplish, and perfect the like affociation with all the colonies on the continent for the like falutary purpofes and no other,"

The opposition to the stamp-act raged apparently more in New-York and Connecticut than in the Massachusetts; but the affociation being agreed upon, was sent by express to the sons of liberty at Bolton, and received Sunday the second of February, 1766. On its receipt, letters were forwarded to a few individuals; and on the fixth of February, a circular letter to the several towns in the colony, containing the association and the defire of the first original associators to accomplish the like association, with a request to be informed of the sentiments and dispositions of the people in such towns. A letter was also sent on the same subject, to the sons of liberty at Portsmouth in Hampshire colony. They met; and in their answer of February the eighth, testified their approbation of the measure already taken, and their determination to oppose the execution of the stamp-

The Boston sons of liberty accepted the proposal of uniting themselves to New-York and Connecticut; and in their letter to the brotherhood at Newtich, proposed to commence a continental mion, of which the latter greatly approved in their answer of February the tenth.

On February the thirteenth, the fons of liberty at Boston whote a circular letter to New-Hampshire, Connecticut, and New-York; and before the month was ended, the New-Yorkers sent circular letters as far as South-Carolina, urging a continental union.

Most of the towns in the Maffachufetts, having been applied to, fignified "their determination to march with their whole torce to the fup ort of the British conficution, and consequently the relief of those that shall or may be in danger from the stampact, or its abettors."

It is not to be supposed, that the disorderly proceedings above related, were chargeable folely on the dregs of the colonies.-The fons of liberty at New-York, who held regular meetings, were faid to be directed by much greater persons than any that appeared among them. The mobs consisted not of mere rabble; but were composed much of independent freemen and freeholders, fo that foine of the first people in the provinces were intimidated, and left the cause of the parliament without proper support. Merchants, assemblymen, magistrates, &c. united directly or indirectly in the riots, and without their influence and infligation the lower class of inhabitants would have been quiet; but great pains were taken to rouse them into action. At Boston fuch was the protection and countenance given to the rioters, that fome of the principal ringleaders walked the streets with impunity, no officer daring to attack them, no attorney-general to profecute them, no witness to appear against them, and no judge to fit upon them. But when the enormities are faid to have originated from the Presbyterians and Congregationalists, the charge must be imputed to malevolence, or to gross ignorance, or a mixture of both. The gentlemen on the fide of government, who were upon the fpot, in their letters written at the time, placed them to the account of the Virginia refolves. Mr. Hutchinson tells his correspondent, "Nothing extravagant appeared in the papers till an account was received of the Virginia refolves." Mr. Hughes writes, "the fire began in Virginia:"governor Barnard, "the publishing the Virginia resolutions proved an alarm bell to the disaffected:" another, in his letter to Mr. Secretary Conway, from NewYork, "the refolves of the affembly of Virginia gave the figual for a general outcry over the continent." The Virginians are episcopalians, and if there is either blame or merit, in exciting that fixed and spirited opposition to the stamp-act, which followed upon their refolves, let them be credited for the fame: to them belongs the honor or difgrace; and folely to particular colonies the difgrace of the feveral enormities committed in them. The bulk of the people at Bufton are congregationalists; at New-York, the presbyterians, including the Dutch and foreign focieties, may possibly be fully equal to, or even exceed the epifcopalians. At Newport all denominations are equally encouraged, and enjoy no afcendency over each other, and therefore might be equally concerned, the peaceable quakers excepted. At New-York the most violent actors were epifcopalians; at Bollon, congregationalists; though here they were joined by a number of episcopalians, and there by a number of prefbyterians.

People in Britain were differently affected by the diffurbances in the colonies. This party was for supporting the authority of parliament at all adventures, and for enforcing the stamp-act, if needful, with the point of the fword; that for quieting the colonies by the repeal of it. Happy for them, Mr. Grenville and his party had thrown themselves out of place on a difference as to the regency bill; fo that the marquis of Rockingham and others in opposition, who were better inclined to the Americans, came into office July 10, 1765. The marquis and his friends did not come to a refolution directly to repeal the act. The main lines of their own plan were not marked out, nor the repeal determined upon, until a little before the meeting of parliament, But the choice of the measure, and of the principle to proceed upon was made before the fession. The papers relative to American affairs were produced to the house of commons: and it was a kind of plan on all fides, to maintain the authority of parliament, and by that very authority to give the colonies every relief the nature of the case required. But the great commoner Mr. Pitt, who neither communicated, nor connected himself with any one, came to the house and declared, that parliament had no right to tax the colonies; and faid also, I am glad America has refified. He hereby deranged matters; threw the oppofition into a rage; and reduced the ministry to a necessity of accompanying the repeal, with a declaratory bill, expressive of the right of parliament to bind the colonies in all cases whatever.

[1766.] Mr. Grenville moved, that the flamp-act should be enforced, and was supported by 134, but opposed by 274.-The merchants and manufacturers joined their efforts with minifiry to obtain a repeal. They were alarmed at the non-importation agreement, and the confusions which existed, as being neceffarily prejudicial to their own interests, and tending to the destruction of commerce. The ministry did not fail to encourage petitions, complaining of hardfhips brought on by the great decay of trade to the American colonies; and also instructions to members from the trading and manufacturing towns. The petition of congress was not admitted: the members not being called together by the authority of the crown, though a futile was yet a prevailing argument against its admission. But the repeal was grounded on the other petitions; and after a fix weeks inquiry into American allairs, was moved for, with the greatest propriety, by general Conway, the fecretary, who had opposed the stamp-bill at the second reading, and denied the right of parliament to tax the Americans. The debate, which enfued, was warm, interesting and long. But, by three o'clock in the morning, " [Feb. 22.] the house, by an independent noble foirited and unexpected majority, in the teeth of all the old mercenary Swifs of the flate, in despite of all the speculators and augurs of political events, in defiance of the whole embattled legion of veteran pensioners and practifed instruments of court. gave a total repeal to the flamp-act, and (if the scheme of taxing the colonies had been totally abandoned) a lasting peace to the whole empire *." The motion was carried by 275, against 167. The cycler counties supported it; for they expected a repeal of the duty on cyder; and obtained it in April. It has been faid. that had not the ministry bartered the stamp-act against the repeal of the cyder duty, they would not have fucceeded t. This however must be a faife charge, if the former marked paragraph is strictly true. During the debate, "the trading interest of the empire, crammed into the lobbies of the house of commons, with a trembling and anxious expectation, and waited, almost to a winter's return of light, their fate from the refolution of the house. When, at length, that had determined in their favor, and the doors thrown open, showed them the figure of their deliverer, in the well earned triumph of his important victory, from the whole of that grave multitude there arose an involuntary burst of gratitude and transport. They jumped upon him, like children on a long absent father. They clung about him as captives about their redeemer. All England joined in his applause. Nor did he feem infensible to the best of all earthly rewards, the love and admiration of his fellow citizens. Hope elevated and joy brightened his crest t."

The ministry had certainly great difficulties to encounter: the principal originated in the colonies, and were caused by the intemperate proceedings of the various ranks of men within them. "Their violence awakened the honor of parliament, especially after Mr. Pitt's speech, and thereby involved every friend of the repeal into the imputation of betraying its dignity. This is fo true, that the act could not have been repealed, liad not men's minds been in some measure fatisfied with the declaration of right \" All the Scotch members, fave two, voted against the repeal. Mr. Bollan, who informed lieutenant-governor Hutchinfon of it by letter, omitted mentioning the names of the gen-

The bill having passed the house of commons, went up to the house of lords. Lords Bute and Strange publicly declared, that his majesty's wish was not for a repeal. The marquis of Rockingham and Lord Shelburne went together to the king, and told what was reported. They were informed, that his majesty had expressed his desire that it should be ensorced; but if it could not be done peaceably and without bloodshed, it was his sincere desire and intention, that it should be totally repealed. The dukes of York and Cumberland, the lords of the bed-chamber, and the officers of the household, were for carrying fire and sword to America. Most of the bench of bishops joined them. Instead of ascribing that to a sanguinary disposition, to which their profession was opposed; let it be imputed to the painful prospect of being hindered eventually, from establishing the English hierarchy within the American colonies. There were in the house of lords, proxies included, for the repeal 105, against it, 71.

On Wednesday, March the nineteenth, his majesty went to the house of peers, and passed the bill for repealing the American stamp-act; as also that for securing the dependency of the colonies on the British crown. On this occasion the American merchants made a most numerous appearance, to express their gratitude and joy; ships in the river displayed their colours; houses at night were illuminated all over the city, and every decent and orderly method was observed, to demonstrate the just sense they entertained of his majesty's goodness, and the wisdom of parliament, in conciliating the minds of the people on this critical occasion. An express was dispatched immediately to Falmouth, with letters to the different provinces, acquainting them with the news of the repeal; that so their fears might vanish, and give place to joy and exultation.

LETTER IV.

Rosbury, April 14, 1773.

M. Samuel Adams's name will occur frequently in the course of our correspondence; be it noted, therefore, that the first time of his being returned for Boston, [Sept. 27, 1765] and serving as a representative, was upon an election occasioned by the death of Oxenbridge Thacher, esq. The deceased belonged to the band of patriots; but when he happened to think differently from Mr. Otis, jun. in the house of assembly, the latter treated him in fo overbearing and indecent a manner, that he was obliged at times to call upon the speaker to interpose and protect him. The flate of affairs required a particular attention to the political fentiments of the person who should be chosen. The inhabitants, in fixing upon Mr. S. Adams, made choice of a member, who was zealoufly attached to the rights of the Maffachusetts in particular, and the colonies in general; and but little to his own perfonal interests. He was well qualified to second Mr. Otis, and learned in time to ferve his own public views by the influence of the other. He was foon noticed by the house, chosen and continued their clerk from year to year, by which means he had the cultody of their papers; and of thefe he knew how to make an advantage for political purpofes. He was frequently upon important committees, and acquired great ascendency, by discovering a readiness to acquiesce in the proposals and amendments of others, while the end aimed at by them, did not eventually frustrate his leading defigns. He showed a pliableness and complaifance in these smaller matters, which enabled him in the iffue to carry those of much greater consequence; and there were many favorite points, which the fons of liberty in the Ma/fachusetts meant to carry, even though the stamp-act should be repealed.

[1766.] Mr. Pitt's declaration against the parliament's right to impose internal taxes, and his saying I am glud America has refisled, were seized with eagerness by the popular leaders in the colonies. They praised and idolized him for the same, without regarding what he had declared, in favor of the authority of parliament in all cases of external taxation, and for enforcing all laws for that purpose; and notwithstanding his having said, "If obedience be refused, I would not suffer a horse-nail to be made in the plantations." Their spirits were elated, and they took encouragement from his declaration, to fortify themselves in their own fentiments upon American liberty.

It is impossible to express or describe the extraordinary joy, with which the body of the Americans received the news of the repeal, though the power of the vice-admiralty courts remained unabridged, and the declaratory act was added. The latter was considered by some, as passed merely to save appearances, while contemned by others, whose wisdom would have been more evident, had they repressed their contempt, whatever was their opinion. In regard to the former, "the judges of the vice-admiralty courts in the colonies had assigned them, by acts of parliament, a jurisdiction for the recovery of penalties upon the laws of revenue and trade, without juries for near a century past*." Had a prudent and moderate temper taken possession of all parties at this period, it had been happy; but they were so much heated in some colonies, as to be determined upon opposing each other.

When the choice of members for Boston, to represent the town in the next general court, was approaching, Mr. John Rowe, a merchant, who had been active on the side of liberty, in matters of trade, was thought of by some influential persons. Mr. Samuel Adams artfully nominated a different one, by asking with his eyes looking to Mr. Hancock's house, "Is there not another John, that may do better?" The hint took. Mr. John Hancock's uncle was dead, and had left him a very considerable fortune. Mr. Samuel Adams judged, that the fortune would give credit and support to the cause of liberty; that popularity would please the possession; and that he might be easily secured by prudent management, and might make a conspicuous sigure in the band of patriots.

Messers. James Otis, jun. Thomas Cushing, Samuel Adams, and John Hancock, (who had never been of the house before) were returned for Boston. The town of Plymouth made choice also of a new representative, the high sherisf of the county, James Warren, esq; a gentleman of real abilities, and who espoused the side of liberty upon principle. The government wished to have him on their side, and played off both threats and pro-

[May 28.] The general court met according to charter. The house of assembly chose Mr. Olis speaker. Governor Bernard negatived, instead of adopting the conciliating measure of accepting him. The acceptance might have foftened and induced him to have dropped the plan of leaving out of the council, in the new election, the crown officers and justices of the superior court; but the refufal confirmed him in it, and by irritating the house enabled him to execute it the more easily. The crown officers were the lieutenant governor and fecretary, Meffrs. Hutchinfon and Oliver; the others held only provincial com-The opposition affigned as the reason for leaving them out, that they might redrefs a grievance long complained of by their constituents, a dangerous union of legislative and executive powers in the same persons. But the true ones probably were, the fuspicions and dislike they entertained of and to their political fentiments, and Mr. Otis's having been negatived. Mr. Bernard retaliated, and excepted against the fix counsellors chofen in the room of the others. Thus the animofity was increaf-

ed. Had he negatived two or three only, there might have been an opening for healing the breach; but now it was otherwife. The liberty party gained flrength, and it was ordered by the affembly, [June 12.] "That the debates of this house be open, and that a gallery be erected for the accommodation of fuch as shall be inclined to attend them." A gallery was prepared with the utmost expedition, and finished in a few days. It was viewed as a great acquifition to the common cause; and certainly served a double purpose. The admission of the people at large, to hear the debates, and to watch the members, restrained some from speaking with their usual freedom in support of governmental measures; and encouraged others to indulge themselves in all that animated language, and those folemn protestations of disinterested zeal for the rights and privileges of their country, which are fo taking with men of honest minds and plain understandings. But you are not to suppose that these protestations were always true on this fide of the Atlantic, any more than on yours. Many joined the banners of liberty, and violently opposed the governor and governmental measures, because of the restraints they were under from the laws of trade, the danger they were in of suffering by them, and his perfifting to give these laws all the support in his power. The opposition had great advantage in the political contest, by branding all the supporters of government as friends to the stamp-act, though they knew to the contrary. Both fides were fenfible that the act was merely financial, without any regard to the political state of America, or any purpose to remove one of its difficulties.

The house was unanimous in voting, that thanks should be returned to the duke of Grafton and other noblemen, to Mr. Pitt and other gentlemen, who had been active and aiding in the repeal of the stamp-act. However, when his majesty's recommendation to make up the losses of the sufferers in the late unhappy times, came before them from the governor, with these words, "The justice and humanity of this requisition is so forcible, that it cannot be controverted; the authority with which it is introduced, should preclude all disputation about complying with it;" they objected to the manner in which it was proposed, as being "derogatory to the honor of the house, and in breach of the privileges thereof," and unreasonably declined making compensation; whereas their privileges might have been preserved uninjured, by a vote to relieve the sufferers upon their own application, out of dutiful respect to the mild representation of his majesty, and out of humanity and generosity to the sufferers.

When a compensation was first talked of, it was the general opinion, that it ought to be made, but that it was due from Boston only, and not the province in general. This thought probably determined the Boston members to oppose making the compenfation even out of the treafury; a way in which it might have been done, had they and their friends joined the friends of government. But had the money been ordered out of the treasury, a fubfequent motion might have charged it upon Boston, which as the tax bill was to be past at that time, would have been eafily effected. The interest of the town induced its members to employ every circumstance to prevent the compensation's being voted at present. After a while repeated advices were received. that the honor of parliament was engaged to fee the compensation made, and that they would certainly take it in hand, if the provincial affembly refused. It was obvious, that the parliament could enforce payment from a fea-port. The people of Boston grew uneasy, that the money was not paid. A townmeeting was called: the abovementioned expedient was propofed and approved of, and their representatives were directed to use their influence, that compensation might be granted upon those principles, and the money be paid out of the treasury.

[Sept.] Mr. Hutchinson and the other fufferers petitioned for relief. Their petitions were considered; and on the question being put, "Whether shall compensation be made out of the province treasury?" it passed in the negative. A bill however, was finally admitted for making compensation, which was to be transmitted to the several towns, for the sentiments of the constitu-

[Dec. 5.] It passed to be engrossed, yeas 53, nays 35; but not without the house's resolving, "That it is under a full perfusion, that the sufferers have no just claim or demand on the province."—A needless resolve, tending to excite disgust in many, without answering any important purpose. The act granted compensation to the sufferers; and a free and general pardon, indemnity and oblivion to the offenders in the late times. It was disallowed at home, on account of the assembly's having incorporated an act of pardon with an act of compensation, without having obtained his majesty's previous consent to such act of pardon. The sufferers however received the compensation, and the offenders were not prosecuted.

[Nov. 7.] In Virginia a bill passed the house of burgesses, for creeting a statue to his majesty, as an acknowledgment for repealing the stamp-act, and also an obelisk to commemorate those worthy patriots who distinguished themselves in bringing about that happy event. And at New-York, [Dec.] an act was passed for making restitution to the several persons therein named, for losses sustained in the late commotions. But when the affembly was applied to, for carrying into execution the act of parliament of the preceding year, for quartering his majesty's troops, they faid in their address to the governor, Sir Henry Moore, "According to the construction put on it here, it is required, that all the forces, which shall at any time enter this colony, shall be quartered during the whole year, in a very unufual and expensive manner: by marching several regiments into this colony, this expence would become ruinous and insupportable; and therefore we cannot, confistent with our duty to our constituents, put it in the power of any person (whatsoever confidence we may have of his prudence and integrity) to lay such a burden on them:" and so justified their declining to provide for the troops.

Before closing the account of 1766, be it observed, that the people of Connecticut failed not to show their resentment against their late governor's having qualified, agreeable to what the stampast enjoined. There was a meeting of gentlemen at Hartford, for concerting a plan for the choice of a new governor and counfellors, in the room of those, who with him had taken the oath required. Matters were so managed at this meeting, that when the election came on, Mr. Pitkin was chosen governor, and colonel Trumbull, deputy-governor. But the episcopalians, almost to a man, voted for Mr. Fitch; and by thus making a party with administration, against the claims and rights of their colony, ren-

Jan. 31, 1767. The Maffachusetts house of assembly continued their opposition to the lieutenant governor, Mr. Hutchinfon, and refolved, "That he not being elected a counfellor, has by the charter, no right to a feat at the council board, with or without a voice, while the commander in chief is in the province." March the fifth the council determined the fame; but in their message to the house, expressed their surprise at what had been done without them, and at its not being mentioned to the board till February the twenty-fourth. Mr. Hutchinfon afterward did not attempt to be prefent. Lord Shelburne, in answer to what was transmitted to him, by the governor upon the affair, wrote in September, "the admillion of the lieutenant governor lies after all in the breaft of the council only, as being the proper judges of their own privileges, and as having a right to determine whom they will admit to be present at their deliberations." These proceedings of the M. fachusetts and New-York affemblies, thought to be, in name at leaft, two of the molt confiderable in the colonies, were ascribed to an unreasonable perverseness of temper; and exasperated the friends of America by exposing them, however unjustly, to the imputation of facrificing the interests of Great-Britain to those of America. They also encouraged the Anti-Americans to resume the plan of taxing the colonies; and Mr. Charles Townsend pawned his credit to them for effecting it, and became chancellor of the Exchequer. But, three of the ministry opposed in the council, taxing the Americans as fresh; and it would have been a blessing had

[May 13.] The chancellor of the Exchequer moved for leave to bring in bills, for granting a duty upon paper, glass, painters colours, &c. in the British American colonies; for fettling falaries on the governors, judges, &c. in North-America; and for taking off the duty on teas exported to America, and granting a duty of three-pence a pound on the importation in America. Two bills were at length framed, the one for granting duties in the British colonies in America, on paper, glass, painters colours, tea, &c. the other for taking off the duty of a shilling a pound on all black and Singlo tea, and for granting a drawback on teas exported to Ireland and America. The first received the royal affent June the twenty-ninth; the last July the fecond. The preamble to the first act expresses, that the duties are laid, "for the better support of government, and the administration of the colonies." The colonists deemed it unnecessary, unjust, and dangerous to their most important rights. There is a clause in it, enabling the crown, by fign manual, to establish a general civil list, throughout every province in North-America, to any indefinite extent, with any falaries, pensions or appointments, to any unlimited amount, even to the produce of the last farthing of the American revenue. point was now carried, which had been the object of every minister fince the reign of Charles II. viz. the establishment of a civil list in America, independent of the affemblies. Mr. Richard Jackfon spoke in the house of commons against that part of the bill, and was supported only by Mr. Huske, and no other member. He was convinced, that though the judges ought to be independent, both of crown and people, yet mischiefs might arise from the independency of governors on the people, much greater than could arise from their dependence; and that it was not fit, that fuch persons as governors usually are, should be independent of the people, and dependent upon the crown for their governments. The aft provides, that, after all fuch ministerial warrants under the fign manual, as are thought proper and necessary, shall be satisfied, the residue of the revenue shall be at the dispofal of the parliament. But who can suppose, that such warrants will ever be faissied, till ministers have provided for all their friends and favorites? May it not be said upon the plan of this act, "the mockery of an American revenue proves at last to be the crumbs that fall from the minister's table—the residue indeed, of a royal warrant, countersigned by the first lord of the treasury *?"

An account being received of New-York's having refused to provide for quartering the troops, Mr. Grenville and his adherents raised such a clamour against America, that it was thought necessary to bring in a bill [May 27.] "for restraining the assembly of New-York from passing any act, till they had complied with the act of parliament for the furnishing his majesty's troops with the necessaries required by that act;" and it had the royal affent the second of July. The taking away in this manner from the province of New-York all the powers of legislation, till they should comply with the former act, occasioned a general alarm among the Americans. They now saw that their own colonial parliaments, as they considered them, were to be bound to what the British ministry might deem their good behaviour, by the acts of a British parliament. Nothing could be more grating to the sons of liberty in every province. It was the club of power which, while it knocked down the New-York assembly, threat-

A plan of a board of commissioners for the American department, in order to eafe the old board of commissioners of part of its burden through increasing business, had been in contemplation. It was intended to be placed in London, in order to be near the treasury, the ultimatum of revenue matters. Mr. Paxton, thought to be the most plausible and infinuating of mankind, though not the most fincere, having left Boston and gone to Britain, had free access to the chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Charles Townsend. It is faid, that he whined, cried, professed, fwore, and made his will in favor of that great man; and then urged the necessity of an American board of commissioners, and his having a feat at it. He might forward the business. Be that as it may, the chancellor brought in a bill [June 3.] for establishing a custom-house and a board of commissioners in America, which also passed into an act at the same time with the former. Mr. Paxton, for his own convenience and pleafure, might procure the fixing the board at Boston; but of all places it was the most improper. The people were of all others the most jealous of infringements on their liberties; and were the least fuited to fee crown officers living among them in great flate, upon what they could not but deem, from the inediocrity of their own circumstances, large salaries, payable from the revenue, to be raifed from the colonies. The board should have been placed at New-York. Smuggling was as prevalent there as at Boston. The inhabitants had been long used to crown officers with fplendid appearances; the commanders of his majesty's troops refided much among them; numbers of them lived in a higher stile than the Bostonians; beside, there the commissioners would have had forces at hand to have supported them, and have met with greater affishance from the fervants of a royal government and their connections. The timing also as well as the placing of the board, was rather unfortunate; for it supplied the Americans with the opportunity of propagating, that it was appointed merely to enforce the new duties. By this means the people were inflamed, and the appointment was pronounced unconstitutional and oppressive. The duties were to take place after the twentieth of November; and in the beginning of that month, three of the commissioners, Henry Hulton, William Burch, and Charles Paxton, efgrs. arrived at Boston: the other two, John Temple and John Robinson, esqrs. were in America before. As to the expence of the board of customs, including the whole, it was a thousand pounds less than that of the four furveyors general, and the office connected with them at Lon-The chancellor had been instrumental in reviving those American animofities, which the repeal of the stamp-act had quieted; but did not live to fee the fatal confequences which have followed, as he died the fourth of September.

[Oct. 28.] A few gentlemen at a private club in Bofton, having fuggefled a non-importation agreement, the thought was improved upon, till at length the inhabitants, at a town meeting, agreed upon measures to promote industry, æconomy, and manufactures; thereby to prevent the unnecessary importation of European commodities. They also voted, that a subscription paper should be prepared, and a committee appointed to procure subscriptions to it; by which the parties engaged to encourage the use and consumption of all articles manufactured in any of the British American colonies; and after the thirty-first of December following, not to purchase certain enumerated articles

The failure of expected fuccess from these measures, and an apprehension of disagreeable consequences from an ineffectual opposition, were probably the motives that induced Mr. Otis, at a subsequent town-meeting, [Nov. 20.] to make a long speech on the side of government, wherein he afferted the king's right to appoint officers of the customs, in what number and by what denomination he pleased; and that as to the new duties, it would be very imprudent in the town to make an opposition to them, when every town in the province, and every other province in America seemed to acquiesce in them and be contented. But the proposed measures were afterward approved of and adopted at Providence and Newport.

[Jan. 1768.] The Connecticut towns and New York followed the example. Still the business labored without being productive of any important effects. This engaged the attention of one captain Malcolm, a fmall trader, who about eighteen months before had made himself famous by a violent and successful relistance with fword and pistol to the custom-house officers, when endeavouring to fearch his house for uncustomed goods, under the authority of a writ of affiffance. Having, about the middle of February, fafely run the cargo of a schooner from Fyall, confifting of about fixty pipes of wine, he within two or three days procured a meeting of some merchants and traders, at which he presided. Nothing was determined upon more, than the calling of a general meeting of the merchants on Friday; March the fourth. This may be stilled the first movement of the merchants against the new acts of parliament. The result of this meeting was, that a subscription for not importing any English goods, except for the fifthery, for eighteen months, should be prepared and carried round the town. It met with no great encouragement, and many declined fubscribing. On this, all engines were fet to work; fome were threatened and made afraid for their persons and houses; others for their trade and credit.-By fuch means the fubfcription was filled. But the merchants of New York and Philadelphia declining to concur in the meafure, those of Boston were obliged to give it up for the present. However, they renewed it within a few months, as you will learn below.

The New England spirit of patriotism and economy was greatly approved of at Philadelphia: and it was said, that "If America is saved from its impending danger, New England will be its a knowledged guardian." Periodical pieces were published at Boston, on the nature and extent of British parliamentary power. Hints were thrown out about independency, and intimations given, that freemen were not to be governed any more than taxed but by their own consent, in real or virtual representatives. The power of British legislation over the Americans was questioned, and virtually denied. Matters were brought to this length, by broaching a new dispute that should never have been moved again; and which might happily have lain dormant for Vol. I.

half a century or more, had no fresh attempt been made to tax the Americans. Before the stamp-act, they allowed the mother country a certain prerogative over them. They acquiefced in the parliament's right to make many acts, binding them in divers internal matters, and regulating their trade. They did not reason neither then nor immediately after the repeal, "if the parliament has no right to tax us internally, they have none to tax us externally, or to make any other law to bind us." They admitted the diffinction between internal and external taxation, and between raifing money from the regulation of trade, and raifing it for the purposes of a revenue. The wisdom of parliament should have abode by their concessions, and have adopted and confirmed their distinction. But being obliged to enter afresh the field of political controversy, great numbers began to think, that the want of representation in parliament freed them absolutely from any obedience to the power of the British legislature; and that there was no real, and only a nominal difference between internal and external taxation, agreeable to what was infifted upon by the party opposing the repeal of the stamp-act. John Dickinson, esq; began so early as in November 1767 to employ his pen against the acts which had been passed, in a series of Letters from a farmer in Pennsylvania to the inhalitants of the British Colonies. They amounted to twelve; and in them he ably maintained the rights of the colonists. He closed with a posificript in these words: " Is there not the greatest reason to hope, if the universal sense of these colonies is immediately exprest by resolves of the affemblies in support of their rights, by instructions to their agents on the subject, and by petitions to the crown and parliament for redress, that those measures will have the same success now that they had in the time of the stamp act?" The inhabitants of Boston were so fensible of the eminent service he did to the common cause, that they wrote to him upon the occasion. In his answer, April the eleventh, he faid, " Never will my heart become infenfible till infensible of all worldly things, of the unspeakable obligation I owe to the inhabitants of the Maffachufetts Bay, for the vigilance with which they have watched over, and the magnanimity with which they have maintained, the liberties of the British colouies on this continent." It was probably owing to Mr. Dickinfon's publications, that the Pennfylvania affembly, early in February, before they knew what measures the Maffachufetts Bay, or any other colony, would purfue, took into confideration the act imposing duties on paper, glass, &c. and gave positive in-structions to their agents, to unite with other agents in applying to parliament and praying relief.

It may be justly concluded, from governor Bernard's letters to lord Shelburne, that the Massachusetts assembly were inclined to bury in oblivion the discords occasioned by the stamp-act, and to escape other subjects of suture controversy, had not the late chancellor unhappily revived the animosities, "The house, (says the governor) from the time of opening the session to this day, has shewn a disposition to avoid all dispute with me; every thing having passed with as much good humor as I could defire, except only their continuing to act in addressing the king, remonstrating to the secretary of state, and employing a separate agent. It is the importance of this innovation, which induces me to make this remonstrance at a time when I have a fair prospect of having, in all other business, nothing but good to say of the proceedings of the house "."

"They have acted in all things, even in their remonstrance, with temper and moderation: they have avoided some subjects of dispute, and have laid a soundation for removing some causes of former altercation †."

" I will make fuch a prudent and proper use of the letter as, I hope, will perfectly restore the peace and tranquility of this province, for which purpose considerable steps have been made by the house of representatives ‡."

Jan. 21.] The Massachusetts house of representatives, in a debate upon the "expediency of writing to the affemblies of the other colonies upon the continent, with respect to the importance of joining with them," put a question on the proposition of writing letters, defiring those affemblies to join them, which was negatived for this very reason, because containing the proposition of joining. The house thought exceptions might be taken at it, as having a tendency to form combinations; and that it might be confidered at home as the appointing another congress. It is an excellent rule of the house, that no vote shall be re-confidered, unless the number of members present equals the number at its passing. When they had the same number, eightytwo, which makes a full house, a motion was made [Feb. 4.] for re-confidering the vote, against applying to the other colonies: and the vote of re-confideration was obtained by a large majority. The fame day a committee was appointed to prepare a letter to be transmitted to the several houses of representatives and burgesses upon the continent, to inform them of the measures the house had taken with regard to difficulties they were apprehenfive would arise from the operation of several acts of parliament for levying duties and taxes on the American colonies. The committee, after deliberating a week, reported the letter, [Feb. 11.] which being read in the house, was accepted almost unanimoufly, in the presence of eighty-three members. It began thus: "Sir, the house of representatives of this province have taken into their ferious confideration the great difficulties that must acrue to themselves and their constituents, by the operation of feveral acts of parliament imposing duties and taxes on the American colonies." It then related the measures they had taken in petitioning the king, making reprefentations to the miniftry, &c. and concluded with, "the house is fully fatisfied that your affembly is too generous and enlarged in fentiment, to believe that this letter proceeds from an ambition of taking the lead or dictating to the other affemblies. They freely fubmit their opinion to the judgment of others, and shall take it kind in your house to point out to them any thing further that may be thought necessary. This house cannot conclude without expressing their firm confidence in the king, our common head and father, that the united and dutiful supplications of his distressed American fubjects will meet with his royal and favorable acceptance."

[Feb. 25.] Peter Gilman, efq; speaker of the New-Hampshire affembly, wrote, by order of the house, in answer to the Masfachusetts circular letter-" The sentiments contained in it are highly approved, and the communication kindly received and gratefully acknowledged. The time of the house's existence in that relation is near expiring; they cannot engage for their fucceffors, and can only express their fatisfaction in the Massachufetts proceedings, and declare their hopes, that the next affembly will heartily concur in fentiments on this affair, and purfue the fame method." The letter ran in the highest recommendatory strain of the Massachusetts-Bay assembly; and concluded with, "What remains for us at present is to offer our daily prayer to the Governor and Lord of the universe, to avert the impending evil, and to make way for the full establishment of British liberty in every branch of it, and to quiet every colony in the enjoyment of all their civil and religious rights and privileges." For these courtly expressions, with which the house declined doing any thing in the business, the next assembly was rewarded with courtly commendations. The governor, John Wentworth, efq; in a message of October the twentieth, communicated the copy of the following extract of a letter from Lord Hillfborough, of July the ninth: "It is his majesty's pleasure that you should as-Ture his faithful fubjects in New-Hampshire, that his majesty has nothing more at heart than to promote their welfare and happinefs, whose cheerful obedience to the laws of this kingdom, and sleady resolution in resusing to accede to the measures and proposals pofals which have been urged with fo much indecent warmth in other colonies, cannot fail to recommend them to his royal favour and countenance." The affembly, however, nine days after, petitioned the king, and mentioned that his royal predeceffors granted them a power of legislation, limited to the approbation or difallowance of the crown, with the powers and privileges effential to British liberty, of raising internal taxes by their own reprefentatives. The petition was most profoundly humble, and fo foftly worded, that it could not offend the most delicate ear of the highest parliamentary prerogative man. fome accident or contrivance, it was not fent till antiquated and out of feafon. Mr. Wentworth had gained an afcendency over the people of his government, by which he kept them from entering into fuch spirited measures for the redress of grievances as would be offensive to ministry. The other colonies adopted a different line of conduct. The Virginia house of burgestes applauded the Maffachusetts representatives for their attention to American liberty; took notice of the act fuspending the legislative powers of New-York; and faid, " If the parliament can compel the colonies to furnish a fingle article to the troops fent over, they may by the fame rule, oblige them to furnish clothes, arms, and every other necessary, even to the pay of the officers and foldiers, a doctrine replete with every mischief, and utterly fubverfive of all that is dear and valuable." The council concurred with them in all their proceedings; and their agent was enjoined to confult the agents of the other colonies, and to cooperate with them in applying for redress. Most of the assemblies upon the continent, as they had opportunity, approved of the doings of the Massachusetts, and harmonized with them in refolves and petitions. [April 22.] But an account of their doings had not reached Great-Britain long, before lord Hillsborough wrote governor Bernard upon the occasion. For want of fuller and juster information, or of due attention to the governor's expreffions, the proceeding which originated the circular letter, was mentioned,-" as unfair, contrary to the real fense of the affembly, and procured by furprife; and therefore" upon this miftaken principle, the governor was instructed, " fo foon as the general court is again affembled, to require of the house of representatives, in his majesty's name, to rescind the resolution which gave birth to the circular letter from the speaker, and to declare their disapprobation of, and dissent to that rath and hasty proceeding." In case they refused to comply, he was immediately to diffolve them, and to transmit to his lordship an account of their transactions. [June 21] the house was informed of what was required; and three days after, of what they were to expect if if unpliable. Their refolution not being returned within fix days of the last part of the information, the governor sent them word he could wait no longer, which hastened the business in which they were engaged.

[30.] A committee of the house reported a letter to Lord Hillfborough, fetting forth the feveral votes and resolutions which palfed in the last house of representatives, relating to the circular letter; and showing that the whole of these matters was transacted in the height of the session in a full house, and by a large majority. The letter was approved of by 93 out of 105 members present, and ordered to be transmitted to his lordship. The house agreed also upon a message to the governor, in which they faid, "It is to us incomprehensible that we should be required, on the peril of a diffolution of the general court, to refeind a resolution of a former house, when it is evident, that that resolution has no existence but as a mere historical fact. Your excellency must know, that the resolution is, to speak in the language of the common law, not now executory, but to all intents and purposes executed. If, as is most probable, by the word refcinding is intended the passing a vote, in direct and express difapprobation of the measure taken by the former house as illegal, inflammatory, and tending to promote unjustifiable combinations against his majesty's peace, crown and dignity, we must take the liberty to testify and publicly declare, that we take it to be the native, inherent, and indefeafible right of the fubject, jointly or feverally, to petition the king for the redrefs of grievances; provided alway, that the fame be done in a decent, dutiful, loyal and conflitutional way, without tumult, diforder and confusion. -If the votes of the house are to be controlled by the direction of a minister, we have left us but a vain semblance of liberty.-We have now only to inform you, that this house have voted not to rescind, and that on a division on the question, there were ninety-two nays, and feventeen yeas." The message was firm, patriotic, and spirited; and in some parts allusively severe upon the governor; but every where decently expressed. The rescinders were governmental receivers or expectants. They had, or looked for a reward, for their crouching compliance. The next day [July 1.] the governor passed some necessary acts, and then diffolved the affembly. It is fearce conceivable how a new affembly of reprefentatives could think themselves capable of being more grossly insulted, than by being made accountable for the proceedings of a diffolved and dead one, and by being punished with immediate destruction for not declaring themselves of opposite sentiments to their predecessors. Mr. Otis, in his specch against rescinding, said, "When Lord Hillsborough knows that we will not rescind our acts, he should apply to parliament to rescind theirs. Let Britain rescind their measures or they are lost for ever." His speech by the patriotic enthusiasts was extolled to the skies; and by the governmental ones, was declared to be the most violent, insolent, abusive, treasonable declamation, that perhaps was ever delivered. While the matter of refcinding was under confideration, the house received an answer from Virginia, and one from New-Jerfey, which, though not fo very high as the other, was far from being unfavorable. They had also intelligence, that they might expect the like from other affemblies: these circumstances probably increased the majority against refcinding. Had it not been for the mandate to refcind, the feffions might have terminated prosperously and peaceably: for Mr. Otis, though he had diffinguished himself by carrying the objections to the authority of parliament to the greatest length, had retracted all his former opinions, in a fet speech at the opening of it. He faid, he had fully informed himself of the relation between Great-Britain and her colonies; and was convinced that the power of parliament over her colonies was absolute, with this qualification, that they ought not to tax them until they allowed them to fend reprefentatives; and that if the colonies had representatives, the power of parliament would be as perfect in America as in England. He then argued for an American representation. This surprised the assembly, and induced a member on the fide of government to charge the opposition with the intention of making an American representation necessary, by denying the authority of parliament over them because not represented. The answers of the other party were thought to strengthen the fuspicion. Upon which Mr. Timothy Ruggles pointedly faid, that as they were determined to have representatives, he begged leave to recommend to them a merchant, who would undertake to carry their representatives to England for half what they would fell for when they arrived there. But the best argument to have silenced any of the opposition, who might interestedly hanker after an American representation, would have been to have repeated the resolve of the house on the 29th of October 1765—" A representation in parliament of the inhabitants of the province, fuch as the subjects in Britain actually enjoy is impracticable for the subjects in America." The day before Lord Hillsborough wrote to Mr. Bernard upon the business of rescinding, a circular letter was written to the governors of the respective provinces, to accompany a copy of that of the Maffachusetts, in which his lordship faid, "It is his majesty's pleafure, that you flould immediately, upon the receipt hereof, exert your utmost influence to defeat this flagitious attempt to diffurb the public peace, by prevailing upon the affembly of your province to take no notice of it, which will be treating it with the contempt it deferves." He then added a closing paragraph meant to influence the affemblies into a compliance. lar letter was in fome instances received in time, but produced a very different effect from what was intended. The New-York affembly had felt the weight of the parliament's high displeasure, and been bereaved of legislative power, till they should comply with the billeting act. In the beginning of the year, they voted the fum wanted to the general, for the purchase of falt, pepper and vinegar, instead of passing an act conformable to the parliament's act, which vote was accepted. But when they met at the close of the year, after having completed a petition to his majesty, another to the lords, and a remonstrance to the commons, they proceeded to confider the circular letters from the affemblies of Maffachusetts-Bay and Virginia, and unanimously agreed to answer them in the most respectful manner. They then entered into some very spirited resolves in favor of liberty. and the rights of their conflituents; and appointed a committee to correspond and consult with any other his majesty's subjects out of the colony, either individually or collectively," on any matter or thing whatfoever, whereby the rights or privileges of the house or its constituents might be affected. These doings occasioned their being dissolved.

We are now entering upon another interesting period.

It had been the common practice for the tide-waiter, upon the arrival of a veffel, to repair to the cabin, and there to remain drinking punch with the mafter, while the failors and others upon deck were employed in landing the wines, molaffes, or other dutiable goods. The commissioners of the customs were determined that the laws of trade should be executed.

Upon the arrival of Mr. Hancock's floop Liberty, Nathaniel Bernard, mafter, from Madeira; the tidefman, Thomas Kirk, went on board in the afternoon. Captain Marshall, in Mr. Hancock's employ, followed; and about nine in the evening, made feveral proposals to Kirk, which being rejected, captain Marshall, with five or fix others, laid hold of, overpowered, and confined him below for three hours, in which time the wine was taken out, before entry had been made at the custom-house or naval office. Marshall threatened Kirk, in case of discovery. The captain wrought so hard in unloading the sloop, that his studden death, that night, while in bed, before affishance could be obtained, was generally believed to have been owing to some injury received from his uncommon exertions. The next morning the master entered, as it is said, sour or five pipes, and swore that was the whole of his cargo. It was resolved to seize the sloop for a salse entry's being made; though it was thought by many that no one would undertake the business.

[June 10.] Mr. Joseph Harrison, the collector, and Mr. Benjamin Hallowell, the comptroller, repaired to Hancock's wharf. Mr. Harrison objected to the unseasonableness of the time, being between fix and feven, when the lower class of people were returning from their day labour. The feizure however was made before fun-fet, so as to be perfectly legal. Mr. Harrison thought the floop might lie at the wharf, after clapping the broad arrow upon her; but Mr. Hallowell judged it would be best to move her under the guns of the Romney, and made fignals for her boats to come ashore. The people upon the wharf cried out, "There is no occasion, she will lie fafe, and no officer has a right to remove her;" but the mafter of the man of war cut her moorings and carried her off. Every mean was used to interrupt the officers in the execution of their business, and numbers swore that they would be revenged. A mob was foon collected, which increafed to a thousand or two, chiefly of flurdy boys and negroes. The minds of the people were inflamed by the feizure and removal of the vessel. They had been before irritated, by the captain of the man of war's prefling some feamen belonging to the town; add to that, their aversion to the board of commissioners, the popularity of the owner, and the name of the floop-thefe of course excited their resentments, and wrought them up into a combustible body. Captain Malcolm, who was deeply engaged in running the wines, headed a number of men after the feizure, and was very active in attempting to prevent the floop's being removed. Mr. Harrison was pelted with stones, bricks, and dirt, and received feveral blows with flicks, particularly one on the breaft, fo that it was with difficulty he could keep from falling; he was afterward confined to his bed from the injuries he had received. Mr. Hallowell, Mr. Irving, inspector of imports and exports, and the collector's fon were sharers in the treat-They all escaped with the utmost hazard of their lives. Mr. Hallowell was confined to his house under the care of a surceon from wounds and bruifes. Mr. Richard Harrison, the collector's fon, was thrown down, dragged by the hair of his head, and otherwise treated barbarously. Mr. Irving was beaten with clubs and flicks; had his fword broken to pieces, and received a few flight wounds. The mob proceeded to the houses of the collector and comptroller, broke their windows, and those of Mr. Williams, inspector general, then dragged the collector's boat through the town, and burnt it on the common. This was on Friday evening. Saturday and Sunday evenings are facred; and Vol. I.

the commissioners Hulton, Burch, Paxton and Robinson, esgrs. remained pretty eafy: during the outrages, to avoid infults, they retired from their own to neighbours houses. But receiving information that further riots were intended, and the governor telhing them, he could not protect them, and that there would be no fafety for them in Boston, considering the temper of the people; on Monday morning early, they fent a card to the governor, to let him know that they were going on board the Romney, and defired his orders for their reception at the castle, which he readily gave. They repaired first on board the man of war, and then proceeded from thence to the castle. The collector and comptroller, and most of the other officers of the customs withdrew, either then or afterward. [13.] On the Monday morning large numbers of people were gathered together, and to appearance regularly formed into parties, under their different leaders, in feveral parts of the town. If they meant any thing against the commissioners, they were disappointed by their having withdrawn. In the afternoon printed tickets were put up, notifying a meeting of the fons of liberty the next day at ten o'clock. This prevented all mischief in the evening. [14.] At the appointed time, thoulands of the lower class met; but the day being rainy, numbers adjourned to Faneuil-hall, and there agreed to fend the constables about to notify a legal town meeting for the afternoon. Little else was done at this meeting, but the appointing a committee to wait upon the governor with a petition, the receiving his answer, writing a letter to a friend, and voting fuch inflructions as they thought proper to their reprefentatives. The common talk was, that the removal of the floop was an affront to the town, as it contained an infinuation that the would not have been fafe if left at the wharf in cuttody of a custom-house officer. It was afferted, and very truly, that there had been no rescue lately; but an invincible reason existed for it, as no feizure had been lately made. When captain Malcolm. more than a year and a half back, opposed in an armed manner, the officers attempting to fearch his house, such a number of people affembled about it, when he had got the officers out and thur his gates against them, that they were glad to retreat with out doing their business. This defiance of the law passed unnoniced and unpunished, so that the officers never afterward attempted to make a feizure, although informations were not wanting, until the prefent time, when they were ordered by their fuperiors. About a mouth after, a schooner was seized for having thirty hogsbeads of molasses on board, and was left at the wharf in custody of two custom-house officers. July the eighth at night, thirty men boarded her, confined the officers to the cabin, and carried carried off the molasses. The town's-people were distaissed that their declarations concerning the sloop Liberty, that she would have been safe if left at the wharf, should be so soon falsissed. The select men sent for the master, and ordered him to return the molasses directly, under pain of the displeasure of the town. It was immediately done, and the molasses put on board again,

The day before the town meeting of June the fourteenth, a committee of both houses was appointed to inquire into the state of the province. When they made their report, [30. in speaking of the affair on Friday the tenth, they faid, "The feizure occasioned a number of people to be coilected, who, from the violence and unprecedentedness of the procedure in carrying off the vellel, &c. took occasion to insult and abuse the officers, and to commit other diforders, &c.-Refolved, that though the extraordinary circumstances of faid seizure may extenuate the criminality, yet being of a very criminal nature, and of dangerous confequence, the two houses declare their utter abhorrence and detestation of them, and resolve that the governor be defired to direct the attorney-general to profecute all perfons concerned in the faid riot, and that a proclamation be iffued, offering a reward for making discovery, so as the rioters or abetters may be brought to condign punishment." Neither rioters nor abettors had any thing to fear from either proclamation or profecution; and knew themselves to be perfectly fafe, notwithstanding the report; but the politicians faw it was expedient to fav fomething to fave appearances, and well-meaning perfons might join them, in the simplicity of their hearts, believing that the others intended their words should be productive of the events to which they feemingly pointed. At the fitting of the fuperior court in Auguilt, the grand jury was found to have among them feveral of the abettors of the Boston rioters, and particularly the famous captain Malcolm, a circumstance that necessarily quashed all informations and profecutions, as it strongly foreboded their issue.

The council in a letter to Lord Hillfverough infinuated, that the commissioners had concerted a plan, with the design of raising a disturbance by the seizure of the sloop Liberty. The infinuation must be placed to the ill will they bore to the commissioners, more than to any thing beside. On the twenty-ninth of July, they said, "The commissioners were not obliged to quit the town; there never had been any insult offered to them; their quitting the town was a voluntary act of their own; we do not apprehend there was any sufficient ground for their quitting it." But it appears from a manuscript in Mr. Hutchinson's hand writing, that the commissioners applied, December the nineteenth, to each of the four judges of the superior court separately for their opinions upon four questions; and that after having conferred together, they were unanimously of opinion,

"That from the spirit which had been excited in the populace against all the commissioners of the customs, Mr. Temple excepted, they could not have remained long in safety at Boston, after the seizure of the sloop Liberty, but would have been in great danger of violence to their persons and properties from a mob, which at that time it was generally expected would be raised for that purpose:

"That government was infufficient to reflrain, suppress or punish the several mobs which had been assembled since the fourteenth of August, 1765; and that at the time of the commissioners retiring to the castle, there was no probability that the fame authority could have had any greater force:

"That they could not have returned to town, and excuted their commission with fafety, at any time after they withdrew, before the arrival of his majesty's troops;

"And that they knew of no better measure that they could have taken, than retiring to Castle William."

Mr. Temple was excepted, for he was not obnoxious to the populace, being averfe to the establishment of the board of commissioners, which lessened both his falary and power. He wished the dissolution of it, and to be restored to his former place of surveyor general of the customs. Though the rest of the commissioners could not have returned to have executed their commission with safety, they might most probably have returned and been safe, had they declined executing the same, which however was not to be expected. They continued at, but were not confined to the castle. They rode about the country at pleasure, without any interruption from the people.

[June 15.] The commissioners wrote to general Gage, colonel Dalrymple, and commodore Hood, desiring troops to support them in their office. Whatever this application might contribute toward the sending of them, yet it certainly did not give rife to it. Measures had been taken to procure them long before. Mr. Paxton, when in London the preceding year, told Mr. Bollan repeatedly, that Mr. Hutchinson and some other of his friends were of opinion, that standing troops were necessary to support the authority of the government at Boston; and that he was authorised to inform him of this their opinion. Most probably he was authorised to inform others also. Mr. Bollan was against sending troops, and when there was a talk of doing it, endeavoured to prevent it, and freely related to a gentleman of considerable influence, what some of the principal merchants said, faid, that they who should send over the standing troops, would certainly be curfed to all posterity ". But the disposition of fome to try the experiment was strengthened by a letter from the commissioners to the lords of the treasury, received before the riot happened; and rendered efficacious upon the arrival of governor Bernard's letters at the fecretary's office, especially that of March, giving an aggravated detailed account of a terrible disturbance on the joyous anniversary of the repeal of the stampact; which general Gage, in his letter of October to Lord Hillsborough, declared, from the best intelligence he could procure, to have been trifling. When the matter came to be confidered. it was agreed to fend troops to Boston. Accordingly, Lord Hillfborough in his fecret and confidential letter to general Gage. [June 8.] wrote, " I am to fignify to you his majetly's pleafure, that you do forthwith order one regiment, or fuch force as you shall think necessary, to Boston, to be quartered in that town. and to give every legal affistance to the civil magistrate, in the . preservation of the public peace, and to the officers of the revenue, in the execution of the laws of trade and revenue; and as this appears to be a fervice of a delicate nature, and possibly leading to consequences not easily foreseen, I am directed by the king to recommend to you to make choice of an officer for the command of those troops, upon whose prudence, resolution and integrity, you can entirely rely." And on the eleventh, he informed the governor, that his majefly, from the representation made by him and the commissioners of the customs, had directed one regiment at least to be stationed in Boston, and to garrison, and (if necessary) to repair the castle; and had ordered a frigate, two floops, and two cutters to repair to; and remain in the harbour of Boston for supporting and affishing the officers of the customs in the execution of their duty. His lordship's letter to Gage being dated two days before the riot occasioned by the feizure of the floop Liberty, the order contained in it, could not poslibly be founded on such riot; though the riot, with the subsequent transactions of the town, might be related as a reason in the resolves afterward drawn up, exhibiting the necessity of fending a military force to Boston. But persons in office are liable to fall into mistakes, through the multiplicity and hurry of business, and for want of due consideration or better intelligence. In this way you may account for his lordship's figning a circular letter, [Sept. 2.] to the governor and council of Rhode-Island. to the following purpose-" Gentlemen, the king having obferved, that the governors of his colonies have, upon feveral occasions, taken upon them to communicate to their councils and assemblies, either the whole or parts of letters from his majesty's principal secretary of state, I have it in command to signify, that it is his majesty's pleasure, that you do not, upon any pretence whatever, communicate to the assembly, any copies or extracts of such letters, unless you have his majesty's particular directions." This was soon published in the Providence Gazette, after being received. That colony chooses its own governor annually, and he has neither right nor power to withhold from the assembly copies of any such letters. Upon another occasion his lordship gave orders to the governor of Pennsylvania, in case the assembly did not act conformable to what was expected, immediately to dissolve them; whereas it is the inherent privilege of that house, to fit on their own adjournments; and the governor nor has no power to diffolve them.

[Nov. 3.] A month after the arrival of the troops at Boston, Mr. Hancock was ferved with a precept for 9000l. sterling, by the marshal of the court of Admiralty. The marshal having arrested him, demanded bail for 3000l. Five other gentlemen were arrested for the like sum. He and the five others gave bail .-The commissioners profecuted the supposed owner, and each perfon they imagined concerned in unloading the wines, for the value of the whole cargo and treble damages. The veffel feized was restored after a long detention; and the suits in the courts of Admiralty dropped, March the twenty-fixth; 1769, by a declaration from the king's advocate, that his majesty would profecute no further. It was idle to think of supporting the profecution by sufficient evidence. Want of inclination or fear would prevent witnesses appearing, and corruption would procure counterevidence from men of no principle, who would justify themselves from the profecution's being built upon acts of parliament, to which they supposed the colonies owed no obedience; and would plead, as in too many inflances is done at home, that it is not he who takes, but he who imposed the oath, who is chargeable with the crime of fwearing falfely. The law would not allow the profecuted any cofts or damages. In this cafe the allowance would have been unreasonable; the innocence of the parties could not have been urged in its behalf.

The colonists could not overlook the good effects produced by the former non-importation agreement; and were earnest for playing off the same engine against the new attempts of ministry, to saddle them with the payment of taxes. About the beginning of April, several gentlemen of Boston and New-York, wrote to others at Philadelphia; in order to learn, whether they would unite with them, in stopping the importation of goods from Great Britain, until certain acts of parliament should be repealed, which were thought to be injurious to their rights, as freemen and British subjects. A numerous meeting of merchants followed, when an address was read to them. It set forth the claims of the colonies, and then went into an enumeration of grievances, which the colonists had long borne, and seemed willing to forget, had they not been alarmed afresh by the late proceedings of the ministry. The address remarked, that, in the act obliging the several affeinblies to provide quarters for the foldiers, &c. a power is granted to every officer, upon obtaining a warrant from any justice (which warrant the justice is empowered and ordered to grant, without any previous oath) to break into any house by day or by night, under pretence (these are the words of the act) of searching for deferters. It pointed out to them the danger they were in, of having erected over them a despotic government, to rule them as flaves. It called upon them to deliberate, by what means they might defend their rights and liberties, and obtain a repeal of the obnoxious acts. It urged them to join in the meafure proposed by their brethren of Boston and New-York; and closed with "United we conquer, divided we die." The Penn/ylvania merchants agreed with the other colonies in opinion, that the revenue acts were unconstitutional; but declined adopting the non-importation agreement, as they believed it to be premature. They knew that multitudes in Great Britain would fuffer much by a fuspension of trade with her, whenever it should be carried into execution; and judged that it ought not to be made use of, but as the last and most certain remedy, when petitions proved ineffectual. They faw clearly that the acts were manifeltly injurious to the British trade, and hoped the parliament would therefore find it expedient to repeal them; and were willing to allow a proper time for the repeals being effected. These reasons induced them to refuse complying with the folicitations of their neighbours. But the merchants and traders of Philadelphia agreed upon a memorial, wherein they flated their grievances, which was transmitted to their mercantile friends in London; on whose affiftance they relied for an application to government for relief; and this they hoped to obtain as to fome of the chief, though it might not be all the articles of complaint.

Britains

But the Boston merchants and traders, having been drawn in, partly by their connections with the politicians and the fear of opposing the popular stream, agreed upon a new subscription paper, [Aug. 1.] wherein they engaged as follows—"We will not send for or import from Great Britain, either upon our own account, or upon commissions, this fall, any other goods than whas are already ordered for the fall supply."—"We will not send for or import any kind of goods or merchandise from Great Britain. Sc. from the first of January, 1769, to the first of January, 1770. except falt, coals, fish-hooks and lines, hemp and duck, bar-lead and shot, wool-cards and card-wire."-" We will not purchase of any factor or others, any kind of goods imported from Great Britain, from January, 1769, to January, 1770."—" We will not import, on our own account, or on commissions, or purchase of any, who shall import from any other colony in America, from January, 1769, to January, 1770, any tea, glass, paper or other goods, commonly imported from Great Britain."-" We will not, from and after the first of January, 1769, import into this province any tea, paper, glass, or painters colours, until the act imposing duties on those articles shall be repealed." The fubfcription paper was carried about town; and, at length, generally figned; though feveral respectable merchants remained non-fubfcribers. The fame month the Connecticut and New-York merchants came into fimilar agreements; and those of Salem, the beginning of September. Some merchants had undoubtedly the forefight to provide for an abstinence from importation for a

A report having been spread, that governor Bernard had intimated his apprehensions, that one or more regiments were to be daily expected at Boston, a meeting of the inhabitants was called, and a committee appointed to wait on him, to know the grounds of his apprehensions, and to pray him to iffue precepts forthwith for convening a general affembly. He acknowledged his having received those informations which produced such apprehensions, but faid they were of a private nature. The calling of another affembly he told them could not be complied with, till his majesty's commands were received. The answer being reported, it was refolved, "That the freeholders, and other inhabitants of the town of Boston, will, at the peril of their lives and fortunes, take all legal and conflitutional measures to defend all and singular the rights, liberties, privileges, and immunities granted in their royal charter." It was also declared to be the opinion of those present, "That a fuitable number of persons to act for them as a committee in convention, with fuch as may be fent to join them from the other towns, should be now chosen, in order that such measures may be consulted and advised, as his majesty's service, and the fafety of the province may require." It was then voted, "That the felect men of Boston should write to the felect men of the other towns, to acquaint them with the foregoing refolutions, and to propose, that a convention be held at Faneuil Hall in Boston, on the twenty-second instant." It was afterward voted, "That, as there is an apprehention, in the minds of many, of an approaching approaching war with France, those inhabitants who are not provided, be requested to furnish themselves forthwith with arms.

[Sept. 22.] The convention, confifting of committees from ninety-fix towns and eight diffricts, met as proposed; and after conference and consultation, petitioning the governor, declaring that they only considered themselves as private persons, making loyal professions, expressing their aversion to standing armies, to tumults and disorders, their readiness to assist in suppressing riots and preserving the peace, and recommending patience and regard to good order, they broke up and went home on Thursday the twenty-ninth. Advice was received the day before, that the men of war and transports from Halifax, with some hundreds of troops, were safe arrived at Nantasket harbour, a few miles below Castle William. Two days before the convention closed, they dispatched a letter to Mr. Berdt, containing a representation of what had taken place, with such papers and instructions as were judged most suitable to the circumstances of their assembly.

When the news was first received of troops being ordered to Boston, broad hints were thrown out that they should never land; and to strengthen the appearance of an intention to oppose them, a barrel was placed upon the beacon, supposed to be a tar barrel, to have been fired to call in the country upon the troops appearing, which was afterward found to be an empty nail barrel, Many of the deputies came down to the convention, with inftructions and dispositions to prevent the Bostonians involving the province in the fatal confequences of their own furious devices. Numbers were from the beginning, sensible of the impropriety and danger of their proceeding, and defirous by a moderate conduct, to correct the one and ward off the other .-The governor's message to them after their address was high, and might tend to keep fome of them in awe, as the troops were thought to be at no great distance. When Mr. Otis joined them instead of being violent, he was quite moderate; and when Mr. Samuel Adams attempted to launch out in the fame free and unrestrained language, to which he was accustomed in the house of reprefentatives, he was prefently filenced.

The convention having finished in the above manner, the perfons just named assumed to themselves the moderation of those whom they called together for very different purposes. The governor himself was not always wholly ignorant of what was going forward among the sons of liberty. He kept up an acquaintance with some of them; and by that means, at times, procured useful intelligence, while he gave his informers the strongest affurance, that their names should not be quoted, nor any communication be made of it, which could make them suspected. Too much occasion was given for this paragraph, which foon after appeared in the New-York Journal.—" I blame the Bostonians for having given some room for the idle reports of their defigning to oppose the landing of the troops, by the ridiculous puff and bombast (for which our eastern brethren have always been too famous) of warning every man to provide himself with a good firelock, ammunition, &c. under the disingenuous jesuitical pretence of the prospect of a French war, full as absurd and hypocritical as is the pretence of a military establishment in America for its protection and defence."

· When the troops from Halifax were daily expected, the governor would have prevailed upon the council to have provided quarters for them in Boston; but they refused, and in answer to what he advanced, faid, "the troops are by act of parliament, to be quartered no where else but in the barracks, until they are full; there are barracks enough at the castle to hold both the regiments; and it is therefore against the act to bring any of them into town." However, the orders of general Gage to lieutenant colonel Dalrymple were positive to land one of them at Boston. But in the interim captain Montrefor, the engineer, arrived with letters of a subsequent date, from general Gage for the governor and the colonel, wherein the general mentioned, that it being reported and believed from a number of private letters and the publications, that the people in and about Boston had revolted, he had therefore fent the captain to affift the forces, and enable them to recover and maintain the caftle, and fuch other posls as they could fecure. Upon this the colonel altered his plan, and concluded to land both regiments at Boston without loss of time. The fleet therefore was immediately put into motion, and the next morning commanded the whole town.-Every thing being fully prepared, near upon fourteen * ships of war lying with their broadfides to the town, having fprings on their cables, and their guns ready for firing instantly upon the place, in case of the least opposition; about one o'clock at noon, October the first, the troops began landing, under cover of the fhips cannon, without molestation; and having effected it. marched into the common, with mulkets charged, bayonets fixed, drums beating, fifes playing, &c. making with the train of artillery, upward of 700 mcn. In the evening, the felect men were required to quarter the two regiments in town, but abfolutely refused. One of the regiments, however, being without their camp equipage, was humanely permitted to enter Faneuil-hall and its chambers, about nine o'clock at night, that fo the men might enjoy a temporary shelter. The next being Lord's day, the town or state house was opened in the evening, by order of the governor, for the reception of the troops, who took poffession of all the chambers, except the one appropriated for the meeting of the council. He certainly stretched his authority in feveral points; but particularly in thus acting. This frep was an infult not only to the town, as it was a great annovance to the gentlemen and merchants, who had been accustomed to make the lower floor their exchange, but to the whole colony, as the reprefentatives chamber, was now possessed by the foldiery. After the quarters of the troops were fettled, the main guard was posted directly opposite to, and not twelve yards from the state house with two field pieces pointed to it. It was with no small indignation that the people beheld the reprefentatives chamber, courthouse, and Faneuil-hall-seats of freedom and justice-occupied by troops; and guards placed at the doors, and the council paifing through the guards in going to their own chamber. They refented also the common's being covered with tents, and alive with foldiers; their marchings and counter-marchings to relieve the guards; the town's being a perfect garrison, and the inhabitants being challenged by the fentinels, as they passed and repasfed. Persons devoutly inclined, complained much of being disturbed at public worship on the sabbaths, with drums beating, and fifes playing, to which they had never been accustomed in the Maffachusetts. Quarters being obtained for the troops, the council were required to provide barrack provisions for them, agreeable to act of parliament; but resolutely declined going into any measure which might be construed into a submission to the faid act. The opposition of the council to the quartering of, and providing for the troops, was fo encouraged and strengthened by Mr. James Bowdoin, who was one of them, that Mr. Hutchinson, in his letter of November 6, ascribed the whole to his management. It was thought that the peaceable landing of the troops was not what some of the ministry either expected or defired; and that they were in hopes, that the folly and rage of the town and colony would have led them into an hostile opposition, and thereby have afforded an opportunity for giving them fome naval and military correction. Under this apprehension, the gentleman, who delivered the first dispatches from governor Bernard, containing the account of the troops having landed, &c. narrowly watched the countenance and conduct of the person who read them, and was confirmed in fuch opinion. But had he not possessed that opinion, it might not have been excited by what he observed. The sentiments of the military differed so extremely from those of the Bostonians, who were unjustly viewed as rebelliously inclined, that it was not to be wondered at that they were insulted and abused, and that quarrels should ensue, tho' they did not proceed foon to a dangerous height. Undoubtedly the inhabitants could not be continually blameles: there would necessarily be some rash and imprudent persons among such multitudes; but the greatest rashness and imprudence lay in the sending of troops on a service, which could have been effectually and better executed by a naval force properly stationed and employed. Ships of war might have possessed the harbour till the com-

The committee of merchants in London paid a due attention to the memorial fent them by the merchants and traders of Philadelphia, and took pains to obtain relief from the grievances therein complained of, though without effect. The department to which they applied, afforded little hopes of redress in a way that might put an end to the differences that had arisen between Great Britain and her American colonies. The act imposing duties on glass, paper, &c. was acknowledged to be inexpedient; but it was added, "Such has been the unjuftifiable conduct of fome in America, that the present juncture is not a proper season for a repeal." Administration was firmly resolved to oppose it with their utmost strength, while it should be insisted on by threats on the part of the colonists, for in that light they consider the steps which had been taken by them to obtain redrefs. It was faid, " If a proper disposition appears in the colonies, and their merchants, in a fucceeding fession, shall think proper to petition parliament on the principle of inexpediency only, there is every reason to believe that no part of administration will object to the repeal." But the minister did not declare what was the properdisposition he expected. No sooner were the Philadelphians apprifed, by the receipt of this information, that no hope remained of a repeal in that fession, than they unanimously entered into the very agreement, which some months before, when proposed to them, they had declined: and it was their opinion, that as the agreement had been formed on mature deliberation, the people of the province would firmly adhere to it. Of this they gave notice to the committee of merchants in London, by letter of April 8, 1769. In that letter, remarking upon the information they had received, they wrote-"It would become perfons in power to confider, whether even the unjuftifiable behaviour of those who think themselves aggrieved, will justify a perseverance in a matter confessed to be wrong. Certain it is, that the wildom of government is better manifested, its honor and authority better maintained and supported, by correcting the errors it may have committed, than by perfifting in them, and thereby risking the loss of the subjects affections. We are apprehensive that perfons in power are greatly abused, and that the people of America have been grossly misrepresented, otherwise the sleps which they have taken to obtain redrefs, could never be looked upon as threats. Threats they never intended; but as all the American colonies were equally affected, it was thought that their joint petitions would have more weight; and for this end the feveral affemblies communicated their fentiments to each other. This step, to the inexpressible furprise of all America, is represented as "a flagitious attempt, a measure of a most dangerous and factious tendency, &c. The dissolution of affemblies that followed, and the measures pursued to enforce the acts in America, awakened the fears, and exasperated the minds of the people to a very great degree. They therefore determined not only to defeat the intent of the acts, by refraining from the use of those articles on which duties were laid, but to put a stop to the importation of goods from Great Britain. This is the only threat we know of; and if this is sufficient to engage the miniftry to oppose a repeal of the acts, we apprehend the ministry must, by a change of measures, endeavour to regain the affections of the people before they can be induced to alter their de-

" The Americans confider themselves as British subjects, entitled to all the rights and privileges of freemen. They think there can be no liberty without a fecurity of property; and that there can be no property, if any can, without their confent, deprive them of the hard-earned fruits of their labour. They know that they have no choice in the election of the members of parliament; and from their fituation, never can have any. Every act of parliament therefore, that is made for raifing a revenue in America, is in their opinion, depriving them of their property without their confent, and confequently is an in-

*" If then the acts cannot be repealed while the ministry objects, and if to remove the objections the Americans must give up their fentiments, we must candidly confess we have little hopes of a repeal ever taking place; much less is it to be expected, that the merchants will prefume to petition parliament on the principle of inexpediency only, when every affembly on the continent are applying for a repeal on the principle of right."

"Happy had it been for both countries if the idea of raising taxes in America had never been flarted; however, if the acts complained of are repealed, and no other of the like nature are attempted hereafter, the prefent unhappy jealousies will, we believe, quickly fubfide, and the people of both countries in a fhort time, return to their usual good humor, confidence, and affection."

If ministry thought that the resolves of the house of lords, the preceding December, would have put a flop to non-importation agreements and the spirited exertions of the colonists, they soon found themselves much mistaken. It can scarce be imagined, but that some of the Philadelphia gentlemen had received the account of fuch refolves; for the above letter was in answer to London ones of January 4th and 26th, and yet they proceeded as has been related.

The refolves centured the votes, resolutions, and proceedings of the house of representatives of Massachuletts of January and February; as also the declarations, resolutions and proceedings in the town of Boston. They pronounced the election of deputies to fit in convention, and the meeting of such convention, daring infults offered to his majefty's authority, and audacious usurpations of the powers of government. The lords then ordered an humble address to be presented to his majesty; in which they expressed their satisfaction in the measures his majesty had purfued; gave him the strongest assurances, that they would effectually support him in such further ones as might be found neceffary to maintain the civil magistrates, in a due execution of the laws, within the Massachusetts-Bay; and beseeched him to direct the governor to take the most effectual methods for procuring the fullest information, touching all treasons committed within that government fince the 30th of December 1767, and to transmit the same, with the names of the persons most active in the commission of such offences; in order that his majesty might iffue a special commission for hearing and determining the said offences, within the realm, purfuant to the flatute of the 35th year of Henry VIII.

The refolutions and address were fent down to the house of commons for their concurrence. Colonel Barre opposed them; and directing himself to the ministry, faid, "Away with these partial refentful trifles, calculated to irritate, not to quell or appeale, inadequate to their purpose, unworthy of us! Why will you endeavour to deceive yourselves and us? You know that it is not this place only that disputes your right, but every part. They tell you, that you have no right from one end of the continent to the other. My fentiments of this matter you well know. Confider well what you are doing. Act openly and honeltly. Tell them, you will tax them; and that they must submit. Do not adopt this little, infidious, futile plan. They will despise you for it." However, on the ninth of February, they were agreed to and returned with fome amendments; and the address was ordered to be prefented to both houses. The Massachusetts, with becoming firmness, constantly afferted their rights, which drew down upon them ministerial vengeance. They had no general affembly when the refolves and address reached America, the last having been diffolved for refusing to comply with the mandate to refeind, and the time appointed by charter for calling another not being arrived. But the Virginia house of burgesses entered upon the fubject. They met on the eighth of May, and on the fixteenth took into ferious confideration the state of the colony, being alarmed at the diffrefs in which all America was likely to be involved. They came to several necessary resolutions, copies of which they gave their speaker, with particular directions to transmit them without delay, to the speakers of the several houfes of affembly on the continent; whose concurrence in the like

The refolves express, "That the fole right of imposing taxes on the inhabitants of the colony, is now, and ever hath been legally and conflitutionally vested in the house of burgesses, with confent of the council, and of the king, or his governor for the time being-That it is the privilege of the inhabitants to petition their fovereign for redrefs of grievances, and that it is lawful to procure the concurrence of his majesty's other colonies in dutiful addresses, praying the royal interpolition in favor of the violated rights of America-That all trials for treason, misprisson of treason, or for any felony or crime whatsoever, committed by any person residing in said colony, ought to be in and before his majesty's courts within faid colony; and that the seizing any perfon reliding in the colony, suspected of any crime whatsoever, committed therein, and fending fuch person to places beyond the fea to be tried, is highly derogatory of the rights of British subjects, as thereby the inestimable privilege of being tried by a jury from the vicinage, as well as the liberty of producing witnesses on such trial, will be taken away from the party accused." These resolutions were followed by a humble address to his majesty, befeeching his roval interpolition to quiet the minds of his loyal fubjects in the colony, and to avert those dangers and miseries, which will enfue from feizing and carrying beyond fea the inhabitants of America to be tried in any other manner, than by the ancient and long established mode of proceeding.

[May 17.] The next day Lord Bottetourt fent for them, and faid, "Mr. speaker and gentlemen of the house of burgesses, I have heard of your resolves, and augur ill of their effects. You have made it my duty to dissolve you, and you are dissolved accordingly." The gentlemen who composed the house, being reduced by the dissolution to private persons, repaired immediately to another place, that so they might consider what measures were proper to be taken, and chose the late speaker, Peyton Randolph, esq; moderator.

[18.] They entered into an affociation unanimously [which they subscribed and recommended to all merchants, gentlemen, traders and others] against importing any goods taxed, and many other articles; against wines, against importing and purchasing

The next month the Maryland gentlemen and merchants entered into a non-importation agreement fimilar to the Virginian.

The South Carolinians followed the example.

The inhabitants of Charlessown broke off all commerce with the Rhode Islanders and Georgians, whom they charged with having acted a most fingularly infamous part, from the beginning of the present glorious struggle for the preservation of American rights. This had its effect, and Georgia came into the non-importation agreement September the ninescenth; Providence, Oct tober the tenth; but Rhode Isl ind not till the thirtieth.

[Oct.] The North Carolina affembly came to the like refolution with the Virginia house of burgesses, for which governor Tryon diffolved them. Upon that, the gentlemen who had composed it, repaired to the court house, chose the late speaker moderator, and came to a refolution for an affociation against importing, &c. conformable to what had been done elsewhere. Thus the non-importation agreement became general, and was forwarded by the very means applied for its prevention. Meetings of the affociators were regularly held. Committees were appointed to examine the cargoes of all veffels arriving from Britain; and regular votes and resolutions of censure were passed in those meetings, upon such as resused to concur in the associations, and their names published in the news-papers as enemies to their country. The decrees of those committees met with a respect and obedience denied to the constitutional authority of government. In some cases goods imported from Britain were locked up in warehouses, under the case of the committees, and in a few inflances returned. Portfmouth, the only feaport in New-Hampshire, never came into the non-importation agreement. Governor Wentworth had address enough to prevent it, and keep all quiet. There are few private schools in that colony, and the bulk of the people are very illiterate. If a person can write a note of hand, read a chapter, and cypher to the rule of three, he passes for a man of learning. Men, whose capacities remain small for want of use and improvement, and who have little knowledge, are liable to be duped by those who possess superior rank and abilities. The affociations were as general, and in common as well observed as could reasonably be expected, confidering the difadvantages and loffes they necessarily occasioned to many. But it is not to be thought, that there were no collufions; that all the goods belonging to the professing fons of liberty, which were stored, remained in the warehouses, without being conveyed out upon particular occasions, and to serve certain purposes; that all, who had given their names or honors not to import, did not privately order fome of the prohibited articles to please themselves, families or neighbours; that when, some months afterward, the zeal of the daughters of liberty, in feveral of the colonies, profcribed the drinking of tea, and rendered the difuie of it a universal fashion, all were so true to their engagements, as not to fip their green or bohea in fecret, or under a new name; and that all who affociated or agreed to the storing of their goods, did it voluntarily and without compulsion. The fear or appearance of a mob often produced a compliance in perfons, who would have gladly retained their goods till they could have turned the fame into cash; and brought them to own, that they were willing that they should be stored, just as they would have been willing at fea to have thrown them overboard to escape personal shipwreck. The committees had the arts of persuasion; and in some places their most powerful arguments for reducing the obstinate were not known to be used by them.

The importer is fent for, and defired to come into the agreement; he declines; he must fell; his livelihood depends upon it. Arguments are used for his complying, and he is urged, soethed and entreated; but it avails nothing. He is determined at all hazards to dispose of his goods as purchasers offer. Some of the mobility, or their leaders, are told, that the importer cannot be prevailed upon. In a day or two he finds himself surrounded; in danger of an assault; is terrified; inquires the reason; and upon learning it, hurries to the committee; begs their interposition; complies with what was before desired of him; hopes that they will restore him to the good graces of his sellow townsmen or citizens, and thanks them for their promised assistance, not in the least suspecting the depth of their contrivance. Every committee however, had not this prudent forecast, whereby to accommittee however, had not this prudent forecast, whereby to accom-

We have hitherto omitted recording the transactions of the Massachusetts affembly in the present year, the Virginia house of burgesses demanding a prior attention, but now proceed to them.

[May 31.] The general court being called together according to charter, a committee from the house of representatives remon-flrated to his excellency; "That an armament by fea and land investing this metropolis (Boston.) and a military guard with cannon pointed at the door of the state house where the affembly is held, are inconsistent with that dignity and freedom, with which they have a right to deliberate, consult, and determine. They expect that your excellency will, as his majesty's representative, give effectual orders for the removal of the above-mentioned forces by fea and land out of this port, and the gates of this city during the session of the said affembly." The governor returned for answer, "Gentlemen, I have no authority over his majesty's ships in this port, or his troops within this town."

[June 1.] He negatived eleven of the persons elected to form

[13.] The house in a message to him declared—" The use of the military power to enforce the execution of the laws, is, in the opinion of this house, inconsistent with the spirit of a free constitution, and the very nature of government. This military force is uncontrollable by any authority in the province: it is then a power without any check here, and therefore it is so far absolute. What privilege! what security then is left to this house!"

It was not urged, whatever the cafe might admit; "The governor is the king's locum tenens, and his office entire. The chief civil and military authority being by the British and our constitution inseparable, the king cannot sever them. An independent military tends to the utter overthrow of the civil power. The operations of the great seal, which is clavis regni, cannot be controlled by the privy seal, the king's signet, sign manual, or signification of his pleasure by his secretary; in other words, our charter cannot be infringed by any of these."

The house firmly declined doing business surrounded with an armed-force, so that the governor the next day adjourned the court to Cambridge.

July 6.] His excellency fent a message to them, with the accounts of the expenditures already incurred by quartering his majesty's troops, desiring funds to be provided for discharging the same, and required a provision for the further quartering the, forces in Boston and Castle-Island, according to act of parliament.

[7.] The house of affembly, as though they meant by it to dispise the parliamentary resolves, no less than maintain their own privileges, passed a number of resolves, and among them the following:

"That a general discontent on account of the revenue acts, an expectation of a sudden arrival of a military power to enforce said faid acts, an apprehension of the troops being quartered upon the inhabitants, the general court dissolved, the governor refusing to call a new one, and the people almost reduced to a state of despair, rendered it highly expedient and necessary for the people to convene by their committees; to associate, consult, and advise the best means to promote peace and good order; to present their united complaints to the throne; and jointly to pray for the royal interposition in favor of their violated rights. Nor can this procedure possibly be illegal, as they expressly disclaim all governmental acts:

" That the establishment of a standing army in this colony, in time of peace, is an invalion of natural rights:

"That a flanding army is not known as a part of the British constitution:

"That fending an armed force into the colony under pretence of affifting the civil authority, is highly dangerous to the people, unprecedented and unconflitutional."

The last is the same with that of Virginia.

[12.] The governor called upon them to answer, whether they would or would not make provision for the troops.

[15.] The house by message, after remarking upon the mutiny or billetting act, answered, "As we cannot consistently with our own honor or interest, much less with the duty we owe to our constituents, so we never shall make any provision of funds for the purposes in your several messages." Upon that the governor prorough them to the tenth of January to meet at Boston.

South Carolina affembly, no less than the Massachusetts, ventured to disobey the mutiny act, and adopted similar resolutions to those of Virginia. The Maryland lower house entered partly into similar ones, but the last was omitted, and the first more strongly expressed. The Delaware Counties early followed the lead of Virginia, and adopted their last resolve verbatim; and toward the close of the year, the New-York assembly concurred in

The proposal of parliament for transporting persons from America in order to trial in Great Britain, pursuant to the slatute of Henry VIII. excited a general alarm through the continent. The procedure they recommended was not wholly without precedent. The case of Culpeper has been already related, Under queen Anne, in 1710, the ringleaders of an unnatural contention in Antigua, wherein the governor was murdered, were brought to Great Britain, tried, and many of them convicted and executed upon this statute. Precedents however, will never reconcile sensible men to practices which, though legal, are fraught, with cruelty, and liable to the most horrid abuses. Beside, the statute was become obsolete.

The Virginia house of burgesses, in their address to his majefly, expressed themselves with propriety upon this subject, "When we consider, that by the established laws and constitution of this colony, the most ample provision is made for apprehending and punishing all those who shall dare to engage in any treasonable practices against your majesty, or disturb the tranquillity of government; we cannot, without horror, think of the unufual, and permit us, with all humility, to add unconflitutional and illegal mode, recommended to your majesty, of seizing and carrying beyond the sea, the inhabitants of America suspected of any crime, and of trying fuch persons in any other manner, than by the ancient and long established course of proceedings; for how truly deplorable must be the case of a wretched American, who having incurred the displeasure of any one in power, is dragged from his native home and his dearest domestic connections. thrown into a prison, not to wait his trial before a court, jury or judges, from a knowledge of whom he is encouraged to hope for a speedy justice, but to exchange his imprisonment in his own country for fetters among strangers. Conveyed to a distant land where no friend, no relation will alleviate his distresses, or minifter to his necessities, and where no witness can be found to teflify his innocence, thunned by the reputable and honest, and configned to the fociety and converse of the wretched and abandoned, he can only pray, that he may foon end his mifery with his life."

We have been reviewing the noble and animated proceedings of the Virginians and others, in behalf of liberty; and cannot but regret, that the existence of slavery and its effects among them, should administer the least occasion for any one's writing concerning them. "The last resolves of the Virginia burgesses deserve a very hard name. It is indeed laughable, to see a few dissipated bashaws, tyrants over a parcel of wretched negro slaves meet together and give themselves airs against Great Britain upon the subject of siberty—this applies to all the southern colonies. The spirit of independence in New England is more consistent and characteristic of the people; but Virginia and the Carolinas are but petit maitres in the business."

It is time to cross the atlantic, and advert to what was doing in Britain. An attempt in the house of commons, to bring on a repeal of the obnoxious ast before the fession closed, proved inesticated. It was objected from every quarter, that it was not a proper time, Lord North's language upon the occasion was, "However prudence or policy may hereafter induce us to repeal the late paper and glass act, I hope we shall never think of it, till we see AMERICA prostrate at our feet." When the session was over, the ministry, with a view, it might be, of foothing the Americans into a better temper, managing their respective affemblies, and bringing them to retract their refolutions and open the trade as before, gave out, that at the next fession the American grievances should be redressed; and Lord Hillsborough wrote a circular letter to every colony, [May 13.] mentioning "their intention to propose, in the next setsion of parliament, taking off the duties upon glass, paper and colours, upon confideration of fuch duties having been laid contrary to the true principles of commerce; and affuring each, that his majefty's ministers, "at no time entertained a defign, to propose to parliament to lay any further taxes on America, for the purpose of raising a revenue." Lord Bottetourt, following the directions he had received, fo to explain measures as might re-establish mutual confidence and affection between Great Britain and her colonies, made the matter known to the Firginia house of burgesses in a speech, and then declared, " It is my firm opinion, that the plan which I have stated to you will certainly take place, and that it will never be departed from. I shall exert every power with which I am or ever may be legally invested in order to obtain and maintain, for the continent of America, that fatisfaction which I have been authorized to promife this day, by the confidential fervants of our gracious fovereign, who to my certain knowledge rates his honor fo high, that he would rather part with his crown, than preferve it by deceit." The house in their address to him, expressed their hope and confidence in a manner that implied fear and distrust; but willing to make the best improvement of what his lordship said, closed with-" We esteem your lordship's information, not only as warranted, but even fanctified by the royal word." The conduct of ministry contained the idea of a public renunciation of all further future faxation of America for a revenue; and the house appeared to view it in that light.

But the circular letter was far from fatisfying the American fons of liberty in general. The evident exception of the duty on tea, and the professed design of repealing upon commercial principles, excited their apprehensions, and confirmed them in the opinion, that the ground of present grievances was not to be abandoned, but to be reserved for a future opportunity of making fresh essays for the imposition of internal taxes. The merchants and traders therefore, of Bojton, soon after the knowledge of it, called a meeting, and unanimously voted, that the taking off the duties on the articles of glass, paper, and colours, would by no means relieve the trade from the difficulties it was under. They then confirmed their former agreement, to fend for no goods contrary thereto, unless the revenue acts were

Though the testimony of the Pennsylvania assembly against the refolves of parliament, and in favor of the Virginia refolves, the repeal of all the revenue acts, and a redress of all grievances, was wanting; yet the Philadelphia committee of merchants, whose character and influence in the present business weighed more than that of the affembly, failed not to express their minds fully to the committee in London, long after the circulatory letter was a matter of notoriety. They thus wrote [November 25.] "Though we are not favoured with an answer to our letter of the eighth of April last, yet as the liberty of America is at stake, and the minds of the people here are much agitated, and as the continuation of the unhappy difpute between the parliament and the colonies must not only affect your and our interest, but the general interest and happiness of both countries, we think it our duty to apply to you again, and earnestly request you would use your best endeavours with those in the administration, to restore tranquility, and re-establish the colonies in the enjoyment of their ancient rights and privileges. We are very fensible, that the prosperity of the colonies depends upon their union and connection with Great-Britain. In this fentiment all the Americans concur, yet they cannot bring themselves to think, that for this reason they ought to be divested of liberty and property. Yet this must be the case, if the parliament can make laws to bind the colonies in all cases whatever-can levy taxes upon them without their confent, dispose of the revenues thus raised without their control, multiply officers at pleafure, and affign them fees to be paid without, nay, contrary to and in direct violation of acts of affembly regularly paffed by the colonies and approved by the crown—can enlarge the powers of admiralty courts, divert the usual channels of justice, deprive the colonists of trials by a jury of their countrymen, in short, break down the barriers which their forefathers have erected against arbitrary power, and enforce their edicts by fleets and armies. To fuch a fystem of government the Americans cannot tamely fubmit; not from an impatience of subordination, a spirit of independence, or want of loyalty to their king; for in a quiet submission to just govern: ment, in zeal, affection and attachment to their king, the people of the colonies dare to vie with any of the best of their fellow subjects; but from an innate love of liberty and the British

"In our last we intimated our fears, that the ministry were greatly abused, and the people of America grossly misrepresented, by some who did not wilh well either to Great-Britain or the colonies. The letters of one of our American governors, (Bernard) and the memorials of a board lately erected among us, not. to mention other documents laid before the public, evince that our fears were but too well grounded. From these it is apparent, that every fly art has been used to incense the ministry against the. co onies; every argument that malice could invent has been urged to induce them to overturn the ancient foundations of liberty. Nay, to compass their base ends, they have declared in express terms, and taken uncommon pains, to make the ministry believe, that, "there has been a long concerted and extensive plan of refisfance to the authority of Great Britain in all the provinces, and that a feizure made at Boston had hastened the people there to the commission of actual violence sooner than was-

In justice to the province where we reside, and indeed to all America, we beg leave to affure you, that fuch representations are without any just foundation, and that nothing can be a greater deviation from truth. Though at the fame time we confefs, that the ends accomplished by these and such like infamous flanders and vile arts, have given a general alarm, and caufed a universal uneafiness in the minds of the Americans. They now, fee a rod of power held over their heads; they begin to feel the feverities of a court, that by its late enlarged jurisdiction, is empowered to break in upon the proceedings of the common law courts; and they have anxious fears for the existence of their affemblies, which they confider as their last and only bulwark against arbitrary power. For if, say they, laws can be made, money levied, government supported, and justice administered, without the intervention of affemblies, of what use can they be? They are no effential member of the constitution. And being useless and unessential, is there not reason to fear they will quickly become disagreeable, and then be wholly laid aside? And when that happens, what fecurity have we for freedom, or what remains for the colonists, but the most abject slavery?

These are not the reasonings of politicians; but the sentiments and language of the people in general. For with great truth we may say, in no country is the love of liberty more deeply rooted, or the knowledge of the rights inherent to freemen, more generally diffused, and the principles of freedom and government better understood than among the British American colonies.

" For this reason we think ourselves obliged to inform you, that though the merchants have confined their agreements to the repeal of the act laying a duty on tea, paper, glass, &c. yet nothing less than a repeal of all the revenue acts, and putting things on the same footing they were before the late innovations, can or will satisfy the minds of the people. The sleets and armies may overawe our towns; admiralty courts and boards of commissioners, with their swarms of underlings may, by a rigorous execution of severe unconstitutional acts, ruin our commerce, and render America of little use to the people of Eritain; but while every farmer is a freeholder, the spirit of liberty will prevail, and every attempt to divest them of the privileges of freemen must be attended with consequences injurious to the colonies and the mother country.

In a matter of so great importance you will excuse this freedom. We consider the merchants here and in England as the links of the chain that binds both countries together. They are deeply concerned in preserving the union and connection. Whatever tends to alienate the affections of the colonists, or to make them averse to the customs, fashions and manufactures of Britain, hurts their interest. While some therefore, from ambitious views and sinister motives, are labouring to widen the breach, we whose private interest is happily connected with the union, or which is the same, with the peace and prosperity of both countries, may be allowed to plead for an end to these unhappy disputes; and that by a repeal of the offensive acts, the cause of jealousy and uncasiness may be removed, tranquillity restored, harmony and mutual affection re-established, and trade return to its usual channel."

and Thomas Mifflin.

The flationing of troops in Boston might afford greater person, al security to the commissioners than what they could otherwise have enjoyed, and might induce them or their underlings to exceed the bounds of their commission or of prudence, but could not prevent sinuggling, or protest informers from insult and abuse. Even skippers, bound to different parts of the colony, had their vessels stopt and libelled for having uncleared articles of trisling consequence on board. Persons who ventured to lodge informations, when discovered, were often subject to a treatment, which gave them a ridiculous appearance, and laid them under a dissinity to clear themselves of the dress imposed upon them. They were stripped, well tarred, and then covered with scathers.

feathers. The punishment took so with the lower class of people, that afterward it was not confined to informers, but was also applied by them to others who offended their dread majesty. There was a degree of intemperance and indifcreetness on the part of the commissioners and custom-house officers, which tended to irritate; whereas the utmost lenity and forbearance were requisite in order to general tranquillity. Mr. Eliot, at New-York, where fmuggling was as prevalent as at Boston, found it necessary to wink at many irregularities that he might prevent disturbances and ill humor among the body of merchants. The commissioners expressed their distatisfaction, and wanted him to alter his line of conduct: he stated the case to a friend at home, and by his influence was fecured from fuch like directions in future. They transmitted to Britain such representations of Mr. Otis, jun. as provoked him to infert a publication in the Boston gazette, which brought on an affray at the coffee-house between him and Mr. Robinson, one of the commissioners, from the latter's attempting to pull the other by the nofe, because of some expressions in the faid publication. Mr. Robinson being in danger of coming off with the worst, several of the company fell upon Mr. Otis; fome of whom held him while others struck him with canes or different weapons. A friend passing along, observed what was doing, pressed in and rescued Mr. Otis, though he himself suffered considerably from the assailants. The noise soon drew multitudes about the house, when Mr. Robinfon and his affociates prudently retreated by means of a back door *. This procedure of the revenue officers (for no military one was prefent) opened a large field of altercation, and multiplied quarrels, which were before too frequent between the king's officers and the leaders of opposition.

Governor Bernard could carry nothing in the governmental way through the presence of the troops, but was continually lofing ground, and growing more and more obnoxious to the inhabitants; so that he was abused in scurrilous publications, for which the Boston gazette was notorious. They were crastily calculated for the meridian where they first appeared, and suited the too levelling disposition of the Bay-men; after the politicians had encouraged a spirit of licentiousness, in order to weaken the force of government, and counteract the designs carrying on against their liberties: but their want of decency offended many of the sons of liberty in the other colonies. Heavy threats were also thrown out against the governor's personal safety. Of these however he was regardless; and being asked by a friend, how he could venture to walk about alone at his country feat, only five miles from the centre of Boston, and whether he was not afraid, he answered, " No, they are not a blood-thirsty people."

At length it was thought proper to recal him, as faid, to lay before his majesty the true state of the province: this he signified to the affembly in the month of June. Before they were prorogued, they embraced the occasion for drawing up a petition. to his majesty, in which, after complaints of him, they entreated that he might be for ever removed from the government of the province. When his letters, written home in confidence, came to be exposed to public view, it would have argued great weakness to have continued him, unless it was designed to adopt his plans, and support him by force at all adventures. Governor Bernard was too open, and had too little command of his temper; and fuffered his refentment to get the better of what ought to have been his political judgment. Every governor shou d divest himself of resentment, especially in his public capacity, as his own happiness, and that of the governed require it.

Men of spirit may be drawn, when they will not be forced.— Sir Francis, instead of aiming his censures at individuals, directed them against whole bodies. Thus he charged the council with fervility to the populace, the pleafing of whom, he faid, was the rule of their conduct; and also both houses of the general asfembly expressly, in his speeches, with oppugnation against the royal authority, declaring that they had left gentlemen out of the council, only for their fidelity to the crown. Such charges flrengthened the hands of those whom he most opposed, by touching the honor of the whole. Had they been true, they should have been suppressed, or mentioned only in private; but though the fubflance of them was even true, when applied to individuals, it might be otherwise when applied to the body, the majority of whom might act upon different principles. Political leaders frequently throw out motives, by which to catch and conduct the well-intentioned, differing from those by which they themselves are actuated. Sir Francis did not possess those mollifying arts which the ferment of the times required; and was more ready to aggravate diforders than to apologize for them. It was common for him in his official letters, to stile the opposition the faction, even while he owned that it comprehended the majority of the affembly. A parental governor would have thrown in many hints to have leffened the displeasure of persons in power, on account of offences committed at three thousand miles diftance, under an enthusiastic attachment to the cause of lizerty, at a period when divers outrages were perpetrated at home, by mobs in various parts of the kingdom. He evidenced too great an inclination to make the worst of every thing; and at times hearkened to and transmitted the strangest rumours. He was a principal instrument in bringing the troops to Boston. It was a favorite measure with him and the lieutenant governor, long before it was executed. While he professed himself a friend to the province, he was endeavouring to undermine its constitution, and to obtain an essential alteration in the charter, through an appointment of the council by the king, instead of its continuing in the election of the general court, where the representatives of

Toward the end of June he had the fairest opportunity of getting the troops removed from the Maffachufetts, but opposed the measure. General Gage defired general Mackay to consult with him concerning the necessity of continuing the troops at Boston, and to procure his opinion in writing, whether his majesty's service required that troops should remain there any longer, and what number, whether one or two regiments. is impossible to express his furprise at the proposition. The knowledge of it, so far as it reached, occasioned a consternation among the civil officers of governments, its friends, and the importers of goods from Great-Britain. Gage, in a letter, requeffed his opinion, and affured him he should not publish it, or make it known on this fide the Atlantic. He immediately anfwered, that he had no hesitation to declare his opinion, that it would be detrimental to his majesty's service to remove any of the two regiments remaining; and that it would be quite ruinous to the cause of the crown to draw all the troops out of Boston: but that he was inclined to think, that a regiment in town, and another at the castle, might be sufficient. He had time enough in which to have ripened a plan with the court for the removal of the troops, to the joy of the country, and with fafety to the civil officers and supporters of government. But he too early, for his own peace and the happiness of his government, deviated from the line of conduct marked out for him by Lord Halifax, immediately after his appointment, when it was recommended to him to' fee and converse with governor Pownall, of whom his lordship wrote in the same letter, "It is impossible to pursue a better plan of government than what he directed himself by," However, his conduct was fo agreeable to the ministry, that a title was fecured him. He was created a baronet, March the twentieth, 1769; and his majesty took upon himself the whole expence of paffing the patent, which added greatly to the honor done him, as it was a favour feldom or ever before granted. Sir

Francis, during his eleven years refidence in America, made very little advance in his eflate. The Boston sons of liberty had great advantages against him, from the early intelligence procured by the supposed author of Junius Americanus, and forwarded for fafety under an unfuspected coarse paper cover, to Mr. Thomas Bromfield, glover, at Boston. Sir Francis was astonished to find, that the contents of his letters from ministry were known by them as foon as by himfelf. When he embarked from the calle on board the Rippon man of war for Great-Britain, August the first, few lamented his departure. Even his friend, the lieutenant governor, Mr. Hutchinson, regretted not his recal; by it he gained an opening for fucceeding to the chair, to which he had been long looking, and was in hopes of being advanced.

Boston and New-York entered into the non-importation agreement fo early as August the preceding year: before the present was out they began to be embarrassed, and numbers grew weary of their engagement. Advantage was taken of these circumstances. The British officers, either of their own thought, or through hints from home, offered merchants the liberty of having their goods directed to them as though intended for the army; and many were got in under that cover, especially at New-York. Several persons imported into Boston and fold freely, without its being particularly noticed, while a few only were called to an account and exposed in the newspapers. This occasioned an alarm; and the people assembled at Faneuil-hall [Jan. 23, 1770. in consequence of a notification, upon the business of preventing the non-importation agreements being rendered abortive.

Mr. Theophilus Iillie, observing the gross partiality which prevailed in fuffering fome to fell, while a few others were proferibed, determined upon felling his goods also. To point him out as inimical to the agreement, and a person whose shop was to be shunned, a piece of pageantry was placed before the door. Mr. Richardson, attempting to remove it was driven into his house by a number of boys, and there attacked by stones through the windows. Provoked, rather than endangered by the affault, he fired and killed Christopher Snider, [Feb. 22. | a lad of eleven years old, who was recorded in the public prints as the first martyr to the noble cause of liberty. The boy was buried with the greatest respect imaginable, according to the custom of the country; and fuch was the number of people following the corpfe, that the foot procession extended a full quarter of a mile. The event tended rather to promote than injure the non-importation agreement. Boys, fmail and great, and undoubtedly men, had been and were encouraged, and well paid by certain leaders, to infult and intimidate those who had avowedly counteracted the combination. and still persevered. The lieutenant governor in April, attempted prevailing upon a merchant of the first estate and character, to promote an affociation, in opposition to the non-importation agreement, but to no purpole; and received for answer, "Until parliament makes provision for the punishment of the confederacies, all will be ineffectual, and the affociates will be exposed to popular rage." Another meeting was called to determine whether the goods already arrived and those expected, should be fent back to Britain. A gentleman having received a letter from a member of parliament, in which it was faid, that shipping back 10,000l. of goods will do more than storing 100,000l. and the faine being communicated, the feale, when upon a balance, was turned, and all the importers belonging to the town submitted to fend their goods back; and in May many were re-shipped on board captain Scott. The leaders gave out that it was done voluntarily: and yet the major part of the merchants wished to see the trade free from restraint; but having in the height of their zeal, called in the populace as their fervants to intimidate those who refused to join in the combination, they were now forced to fubmit to them as their masters, under the influence of a few of the merchants, who still adhered to their first plan. Several of the last importers begged with tears, that they might be allowed to house their goods, but it was not granted. One who had been pretty flurdy, had a committee of tradefmen fent him, with an ax-man, a carpenter, at their head, who told him that there were a 1000 men waiting for his answer, and if he did not comply, there was no faying what would be the confequences. firength of the argument prevailed; and a day or two after the paper published that he complied voluntarily. The Bostonians moreover resolved to leave off all trade with the Newport people, because of their duplicity, and breaking through the non-importation agreement. The next month Hartford followed the example of Bolton. But about the fame time, the New-Yorkers, by dexterous management, were brought to agree to import-" every thing, except fuch articles as are, or may hereafter be, fubject to duty for the purpose of raising a revenue in America." Government gained a party in the committee of merchants, who took advantage of the charges brought against Boston of importing large quantities of goods; and Mr. Hancock was complained of for fuffering them to be brought in his vessels. By these means they prepared the minds of the people for the execution of the plan they had concerted. They did not call a meeting of the citizens, in which the vote of the populace, procured by the arts of individuals, might prevail; but went through the feveral wards, and took the sense of the principal inhabitants separately, when it appeared that the majority were for importing. Upon the receipt of letters from Philadelphia and Boston, the sense of the inhabitants was again taken, and turned out as before. They were severely censured by the Philadelphians for their defection, and by others also. The letter of the committee to the merchants at Boston, informing them what agreement they had adopted, was contemptuously torn to pieces. When those Yorkers, who were in the interest of government, began to concert their plan, they rested on assurances of what would be done in parliament, and knew not, for certain, that the duties on glass, paper, and colours, had been taken off; but the news of the obnoxious act being so far repealed, reached the continent before they had fully perfected the business on the tenth of July *.

The New-Yorkers were in general faithful, while their nonimportation agreement lasted; more so, it was thought, than the Bostonians. These suffered much in their reputation among the fons of liberty at New-York and Philadelphia, for the large quantities of goods found by fome of the newspaper publications, to have been imported into Boston. Some of the inhabitants were defirous of rolling away much of the reproach, by pointing out, that a confiderable part of the goods charged to the score of Boston, belonged to Salem, Marblehead, and other ports; but when the non-importation agreements were ended, it was omitted, and thus they continued to lie under greater difgrace than really belonged to them. While the New-York plan was carrying on, a trial was made by about a dozen persons, to frighten the gentlemen who were inclined to import from fo doing, but it failed: the populace had been fecured.

[April 12.] The king gave his affent to the aft for repealing the duties on glass, paper, and colours. The tea duty was professedly continued as a pepper-corn rent, for the point of honor, and as a badge of sovereignty over the colonies. The ministry might also mean to use it in some suture period, for deeper purposes than could be then fathomed. They intended in the beginning of the selsion to bring in a bill against American associations; but the violence of party was such, that it was thought the times would not admit of it. The strong opposition made to ministerial measures at home, was certainly helpful to the cause of the colonies, and encouraged them to go those lengths which they would otherwise have scarce ventured upon. This however was not to be charged to the anti-ministerialists, as an evil for which they were answerable. Let ministers attempt at any time, to make unjustifiable inroads upon the liberties of British subjects, their opponents are bound in duty, as the guardians of the public, to use all warrantable efforts to disconcert them; and the mischief which follows is to be placed to the account of those who render the opposition a necessary measure.

The news of a partial repeal did not fatisfy the colonists. they attempted in vain to keep up the non-importation agreement after the defection of New-York. The Boston merchants at length, in a meeting held at the coffee-house in October, unanimoutly voted to alter it, and adopt the fame plan of importing with that of the New Yorkers. It appeared to be the fense of the one and the other, and also of the Philadelphians, that no tea should be imported; and that if any was brought into the feveral ports, it should be smuggled to avoid paying the duty. The Virginia house of burgesses, in a petition to his majesty, expressed their exceeding great concern and deep affliction upon finding that the feveral acts imposing duties, for the purpose of raising a revenue in America, were continued; and faid, "A partial fulpension of duties, and these such only as were imposed upon British manufactures, cannot remove the too well grounded fears and apprehensions of your majesty's subjects, whilst impofitions are continued on the fame articles of foreign fabric, and entirely retained upon tea for the avowed purpose of establishing a precedent against us." The present year was marked by a different scene of blood than what offered in February, which could not be introduced in the order of time, without breaking the thread of the preceding narration.

Outrages had been committed by the foldiers; and frequent quarrels had happened between them and the inhabitants of Boston, who viewed the military as come to dragoon them into obedience to statutes, instructions and mandates, that were thoroughly detefted. Each day gave rife to new occurrences which augmented the animofity. Reciprocal infults foured the tempers, and mutual injuries imbittered the passions of the opposite parties. Befide, fome fiery spirits, who refented the indignity of having foldiers quartered among them, were continually exciting the towns people to quarrel with the troops. Not only fo, but a pompous newspaper account of a victory obtained by the inhabitants of New-York over the foldiers there, in an affray undoubtedly excited the refentment of the military at Boston, and exultations among their opponents, and thus increased the ferment. Every thing tended to a crisis; and it is rather wonderful that it did not exist fooner, when so many circumstances united to hasten its approach. The lieutenant governor did not attend to those things properly; and was not fufficiently careful to prevent confequences, by strongly urging the officers to keep their men in the barracks as much as possible, and to maintain the strictest discipline. He was desirous of recommending himself both to them and the commissioners, and therefore was very cautious less the should offend either.

At length a private of the twenty-ninth regiment, paffing along in the morning [Mar. 2.] near Mr. John Gray's rope walk, being provoked by infulting words, refented it; and being overpowered, went off, but foon returned with a dozen foldiers between whom and the rope-makers an affray enfued, which terminated in the defeat of the former; who in the afternoon, armed thenifelves with clubs, and were on their way to renew the action, but were flopped. On this many of the towns people were fo enraged, that they determined upon fighting it out with the foldiers on the Monday. The Rev. Dr. Eliot was told of the determination on the Saturday; and was also informed, that the bells were to be rung to affemble the inhabitants together; fo that when on the Monday evening he heard them ring, he was not alarmed with an apprehension of its being on account of a fire's breaking out in the town, which is generally the cafe *.-It does not appear that any militia were called in before the firing upon the people, or that any regular plan was formed for compelling the troops to move from the town: it is abfurd to think, on the other hand, that there was a fettled plot for employing the foldiers to maffacre the inhabitants. But from the characters, principles and politics of certain persons among the leaders of the opposition, it may be feared, that they had no objection to a rencounter, that by occasioning the death of a few, might eventually clear the place of the two regiments. fome defign was on foot, which might be attended with danger in the execution, may be gathered from lieutenant colonel Marfhall's faying, when giving evidence for the crown-" The bells were ringing, and the people began to collect as they do at the cry of fire, and I began to think it was fire. I had a mind to go out, but I had a reluctance, because I had been warned not to go out that night;" meaning in which the men were shot +.

[Mar. 5.] Between feven and eight o'clock at night, unufual numbers are met coming from the fouth end of the town with slicks in their hands, and serious consequences are apprehended from it. About the same time, parties amounting in the whole to near two hundred, several with great slicks or clubs, proceed from the north end, some of whom say, "let us go to the south end and join our friends there, and attack the damned scoundrels and drive them out of the town; they have no business here."-More people than common, with large slicks, are observed running from all quarters toward King-street. The north end parties collect in and about Dock-square, and attack several soldiers belonging to Murray's barracks about nine o'clock: upon an officer's coming up, these are ordered to their barracks, and when got in, with much difficulty, are immediately confined. The mob follow the officer to the gate, and provoke the foldiers by the most abusive language, and dare them to come out. They are hardly restrained by their officers from doing it. While these things are transacting, some are calling town-born turn out, twenty or thirty times over; others cry fire, fire, in different places, the more effectually to draw people out of their houses, and to increase their numbers; and soon after the nine o'clock' bell has ceased, the bells are set a ringing, which those who are

Upon the foldiers being reffrained to the barracks, the mob are defired by one or more confiderate persons, to return home. A few comply, but the generality have fomething further to engage their attention. Numbers employ themselves in tearing up the stalls of the market-place in Dock-square, for the purpose they express while calling out, "Damn the dogs, where are they now? Let us go and kill that damned scoundrel of a sentry, and then attack the main-guard." The body of the mob when they have finished their repeated attacks upon the barracks, are addresfed in the street by a tall large man in a red cloak and white wig. After liftening to what he has to offer in the space of three or four minutes, they huzza for the main-guard, and fay, "We will do for the foldiers." They separate into three divisions, and take different routs for King-street, one through the main-street. A party, who have collected at Oliver's-dock, bend their course toward the fame point. In the mean time, the fentry before the custom-house is affaulted while upon duty. A boy comes up, and pointing to him, fays, "There is the fon of a bitch that knocked me down." About twenty young fellows, eighteen years old, call out, "kill him, kill him, knock him down." Their behaviour obliges him to load his gun. They pelt him with fnow-balls, pieces of ice, and any thing that offers, and halloo " fire and be damned." They advance upon him; oblige him to retreat; he mounts the steps, and knocks at the door for admission. Meeting with no relief in this way, more persons collecting in the street, and his danger increasing, he calls out to the main-guard, within hearing, for protection. Captain Preston, the officer of the day, being told that the ringing of the bells is Vol. I.

the fignal for affembling the inhabitants to attack the troops, repairs to the main-guard; and learning the fituation of the fentry, fends off a corporal and fix men to protect both him and the king's chest in the custom-house. The foldiers march off with their pieces unloaded, and the captain follows to prevent difor-Ere they have formed, that part of the mob, which comes through the main-ffreet, and appears to be headed by the mulatto Attucks, and to contain a number of failors, upon coming to the · town-house, exclaim—" Damn the rascals, this will never do; the readiest way to get rid of those people, is to attack the main-guard, firike at the root, this is the nest." The foldiers are pelted while going to defend their comrade; and, when upon their station, are ferved as was the fingle fentry, have fnow-balls, large pieces of ice, flicks and other things thrown at them, and are obliged to load for their own fafety. The reproachful language with which they are abused, exclusive of a plenty of oaths and execrations, is," Come on you rafcals, you lobster fcoundrels, you bloodybacks, you cowards, you daftards for bringing arms against naked men; fire if you dare; fire and be damned, we know you dare not," and much more to the fame purpose. The reason for faying, "you dare not fire," is probably to be found in the doctrine lately advanced, "that foldiers, while on duty, may upon no occasion whatever fire upon their fellow subjects, without the order of a civil magistrate." The mob press in upon the foldiers; advance to the points of the bayonets; are defired to keep off; and are treated with cautious attention. This may be owing to apprehensions of danger to themselves in case of a contrary conduct. The shopts, huzzas, threats, screams, and almost vells of the mob, with the ringing of the bells to increase the general confusion, may justly alarm them; but their precaution soon avails nothing. While they are pushing off the people, without once leaving their station or attempting to follow them, the mulatto, and about a dozen persons, several in failors habits, come down to the fpot, give three cheers, furround the foldiers, and strike their guns with clubs, crying out to the others, "Do not be afraid of them, they dare not fire; kill them, kill them; knock them over." The mulatto aims a blow at captain Preston, strikes down one of the guns, feizes the bayonet with his left hand, and shows a hardy disposition answering to the threats which have been uttered. At this instant, there is a confused cry of "damn your bloods, why don't you fire," and partly from persons behind the captain. Firing succeeds. Montgomery, whom the mulatio has alfaulted, after recovering his legs, and relieving his gun by a fudden twitch, is the first that fires, and his affailant falls. After fix or eight feconds, another fires, the other five follow in quick fuccellion.

fuccession. It is agreed, that only seven out of the eight soldiers discharge their pieces, and that no one fires wice. Three persons are killed; five are very dangerously wounded, and a sew slightly. Most are either passengers going through the street, or unaffilting spectators. It is well that no more are killed, considering that there were from fifty to a hundred about the soldiers. They ran off at the firing, but soon assemble again to take away the dead and wounded.

The whole town is immediately in the greatest commotion. Their drums beat to arms, and there is a constant calling out "to arms, to arms, turn out with your guns." The townsmen affemble in the next freet, to the amount of fome thousands. The lieutenant-governor repairs to captain Preston, and upon coming up, asks him, "how came you to fire upon the people without the orders of a civil magistrate?" The captain begins to apologize for what had happened, by faving, " we were infulted;" and is about adding more, but recollecting the impropriety of the place. stops short, and asks Mr. Hutchinson to walk up into the guard room, where he means to finish what he has begun; but the lieutenant-governor goes to the council chamber. The captain's words are observed by some gentlemen, who attend Mr. Hutchinson, and are confidered as conceding to the implied charge of having given direction to fire; and are remembered to his difadvantage. Mr. Hutchinson cannot avoid exposing himself in the midst of the enraged inhabitants, upon whom he prevails to disperse till morning. It having been a clear moon light night, persons have been enabled to diffinguish what passed.

[March 6.] The next morning the people collect in vaft bodies. The lieutenant-governor fummous a council. Before any debate commences, lieutenant-colonel Dalrymple, and lieutenant-colonel Carr attend, being informed, that they may if they will. The town meets in full affembly, and choose a committee, who, while the business is largely discussing in council, wait upon the lieutenant-governor and deliver him a message, declaring, "It is the unanimous opinion of the meeting, that nothing can rationally be expected to restore the peace of the town, and prevent blood and carnage, but the immediate removal of the troops." Colonel Dalrymple signifies to Mr. Hutchinson, his readiness to place the 29th regiment, which has rendered itself in a special

In the afternoon the lieutenant-governor receives another meffage, acquainting him, that it is the opinion of the meeting, confiding of near three thousand people, that nothing but a total and immediate removal of the troops will fatisfy. Mr. Samuel Adams, one of the committee, in his venerable grey locks, and with hands trembling under a nervous complaint, tells colonel Dalrymple, "If you can remove the 29th regiment, you can also remove the 14th; and it is at your peril if you do not;" and continues talking to him, in fuch a refolute tone, and with fuch strong implications, as nearly to communicate the trembling to the colonel. Mr. Hutchinfon wishes to get clear of the council, but finds it impossible; and therefore lays the matter before them. Several declare their apprehensions of more bloodshed, unless the troops are removed. Mr. Royal Tyler in his zeal for effecting it, fays to him, "It is not fuch people as formerly pulled down your house, who conduct the present measures. No; they are people of the best characters among us, men of estates, menof religion. They have formed their plan for removing the troops out of town; and it is impossible they should remain in it. The people will come in from the neighbouring towns; there will be ten thousand men to effect the removal of the troops, who will probably be destroyed by the people, be it called rebellion, or occasion the lofs of our charter, or be the confequence what it may." When Mr. Tyler faid, they have formed their plan, it was not to be understood, that the plan was formed prior, but subsequent to the bloodshed of the preceding evening. His representations might be aggravated: even when there is not a natural cast for hyperbole, perfons inflated by passion, will imperceptibly have a recourse to the figure. Mr. Hutchinson tells the council, "Nothing shall ever induce me to order the troops out of town." They. upon that, unanimously advise him to request colonel Dalrymple to order them to the castle. To the colonel he says, "I have nothing to do with it, it lies wholly with you." While they are prefling him, the people are informed, that the colonel is ready to remove the regiments, if the lieutenant-governor will only join in defiring it. He inclines to fland out, and to leave it with the colonel and council to fettle, as they can agree about the bufinefs. He deliberates till near night, dreading lest any one meafure he may adopt, shall lessen him in the opinion of the ministry and endanger his advancement. At length the fecretary, Mr. Oliver, perceiving how artfully matters are managed, whispers him in the ear, "You must either comply or determine to leave the province." This prevails; he complies with the advice of the council; and the general ferment begins to fublide. The troops however, are not removed fo early as is expected by the town; they continue till the next Monday; and upon the colonel's being asked the reason, he mentions that it lies at the door of the lieutenant-governor, who shuffles with the colonel, in hope that fome occurrence will exist, which may exempt him from the interpolition of his advice.

Mean while captain Preston and his party are committed to jail. One of the wounded men dies. It is determined to bury the four persons* in one vault, and in a peculiarly respectful manner. [March 8.] The generality of the shops in town are flut. All the bells of Boilon, Charleflown, and Roxbury, are ordered to toll in the most doleful tone. The corpses form a junction in King-street, where they fell when the soldiers fired. Hence they proceed in orderly succession through the main fireet, followed by an immense concourse of people, so numer, ous as to be obliged to go in ranks of fix a-breaft, and the whole closed by a long train of carriages belonging to the principal gentry of the town. Thus are they distinguished and honorably attended to the place of interment, with unparalleled pomp, not on account of personal merit, but to express the vehement indignation of the inhabitants against the slaughter of their brethren, by the British foldiery quartered among them, in violation,

[October 24.] Captain Preston's trial begins. Messrs. John Adams and Josiah Quincy are his council. They are warm in the cause of liberty, and offend several of their own party by undertaking the defence of the prisoner; but faithfully employ their diffinguished abilities in his behalf. The trial does not finish till the thirtieth. While carrying on, Mr. Quincy pushes the examination and cross-examination of the witnesses to such an extent, that Mr. Adams, in order to check it, is obliged to tell him, that if he will not defift, he shall decline having any thing further to do in the cause. The captain and his friends are alarmed, and confult about engaging another counfellor; but Mr. Adams has no intention of abandoning his client. He is fensible that there is sufficient evidence to obtain a favorable verdict from an impartial jury; and only feels for the honor of the town, which he apprehends will fuffer yet more, if the witneffes are examined too closely and particularly, and by that mean more truth be drawn from them than what has an immediate connection with the foldiers firing, by or without the orders of the captain. When the trial is ending, judge Lynde, toward the close of his speech fays, " Happy I am to find, after such first examination, the conduct of the prisoner appears in so fair a light; yet I feel myself deeply affected, that this affair turns out fo much to the difgrace of every person concerned against him, ^{*} Samuel Gray, Samuel Maverick, James Calilwell, and Crifpus Attucks. Samuel Gray was a journeyman, and wrought in the rope-walks belonging to Mr. John Gray the rope-maker.

and so much to the shame of the town in general." The jury

[Nov. 27.] On Tuesday commences the trial of William Wemms, James Hartegan, William M'Cauley, Hugh White, Matthew Killroy, William Warren, John Carrol, and Hugh Montgomery, foldiers in the 20th regiment, for the murder of Crifpus Attucks, Samuel Gray, Samuel Maverick, James Caldwell, and Patrick Carr, the last of whom did not die till ten days after he was wounded. The foldiers have the fame counsel that was engaged for their captain. The trial is continued from day to day, Sunday excepted, till Wednesday December the fifth. Attempts were made to prejudice the people against the prisoners, one especially in a certain weekly paper the day before the trial began. The publication included an infult on the supreme court, and expressed the greatest malignity of heart.— To counteract the baneful effects of all fuch proceedings, Mr. Quincy, in his address to the justices and jury, observes—" We must steel ourselves against passions, which contaminate the fountain of justice. Let it be borne deep upon our minds, that the prisoners are to be condemned by the evidence here in court produced against them, and by nothing else. Matters heard or feen abroad, are to have no weight; in general they undermine the pillars of justice and truth. As though a feries of ex parte evidence was not enough, all the colours of the canvals have been touched in order to freshen the wounds, and by a transport of imagination we are made present at the scene of action. The prints exhibited in our houses, have added wings to fancy, and in the fervor of our zeal, reason is in hazard of being lost. The pump of funeral, the horrors of death have been fo delineated, as to give a fpring to our ideas, and infpire a glow incompatible with found, deliberate judgment. In this fituation, every paffion has alternately been predominant. They have each in turn fubfided in degree, and they have fometimes given place to despondence, grief, and forrow. How careful should we be, that we do not mistake the impressions of gloom and melancholy, for the dictates of reason and truth! How careful lest borne away by a torrent of paffion, we make shipwreck of conscience!

"Many things yet exist sufficient to keep alive the glow of indignation. I have aimed at securing you against the catching slame. I have endeavoured to discharge my duty in this respect. What success will follow these endeavours, depends on you, gentlemen. If being told of your danger, will not produce caution, nothing will. If you are determined in opinion, it is in vain to say more; but if you are zealous enquirers after the truth; if you are willing to hear with impartiality, to examine and judge for yourfelves, enough has been faid to apprize you of those avenues, at which the enemies of truth and justice are most likely to enter, and most easily to befet you."

When the evidence in favor of the prisoners is finished, Mr. Quincy refumes his addrefs.—" I flated to you, gentlemen, your duty in opening this cause. I pointed out the dangers to which you were exposed. How much need was there, that you should fuspend your judgment till the witnesses were all examined!-How different is the complexion of the cause? Will not all this ferve to show every honest man the little truth to be attained in partial hearings? This trial ought to have another effect, it should ferve to convince us all of the impropriety; nay, injustice, of giving a latitude in converfation upon topics likely to come under a judicial decision; the criminality of this conduct is certainly inhanced, when such loose fallies and discourses are so prevalent as to be likely to touch the life of a citizen. In the present case, how great was the prepossession against us! and I appeal to you, gentlemen, as to what cause there now is to alter our fentiments.

In the course of pleading, he is under a necessity of saying,— " And here, gentlemen, I must first tell you by what law the prisoners are not to be tried or condemned. And they most certainly are not to be tried by the Mofaic law: a law we take it, especially designed for the government of a peculiar nation, who being in a great measure under a theocratical form of government, its inftitutions cannot, with any propriety, be adduced for our regulation in these days. It is with pain therefore, I have observed any endeavour to missead our judgment on this occasion, by drawing our attention to the precepts delivered in the days of Moses: and by disconnected passages of scripture, applied in a manner foreign to their original defign or import, there feems to have been an attempt to touch fome peculiar fentiments, which we know are thought to be prevalent; and in this way we take it, an injury is like to be done, by giving the mind a bias it ought never to have received, because it is not warranted by our laws."

"We have heard it publicly faid of late, of ener than formerly, Whofoever fheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed. This is plainly, gentlemen, a general rule, which like all others of the kind must have its exceptions—a rule, which if taken in its strict literal latitude, would imply, that a man killing another in self-defence, would incur the pains of death—a docurring that certainly never prevailed under the Mosaical institution; for we find the Jews had their six cities of refuge, to which the manslayer might see from the avenger of blood." Let it be observed, en paffant, that it was ordained that the man-flayer should abide in the city of refuge till the death of the high priest, so every person to escape such confinement and restraint, would be extremely careful left he should prove the casual occasion of another's death; and would not venture upon gratifying a fettled or fudden evil disposition, by needlessly slaying a fellow creature, because it would pass for chance-medley. But to go on in company with Mr. Quincy. " And fo, that the MURDERER shall flee to the pit, comes under the same consideration. And when we hear it asked, as it very lately has been," Who DARE stay him? "I answer, if the laws of our country stay him you ought to do likewife; and every good subject dares to do what the law allows. But the very polition is begging the question; for the question now in issue is, whether either of the prisoners is a murderer in the fense of our laws: what is murder and what not, is a question of law arising upon facts stated and allowed."

" Again, you shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer, who is guilty of death." Here again is a begging the queflion; and moreover the words guilty of death, if rightly consis dered, must be one of those general rules which always have their exceptions. But in the margin of our great bible, we find them rendered faulty to die. Against a position of this kind we have no objection. If we have committed a fault, on which our laws inflict the punishment of death, we must suffer. But what fault we have committed, you are to inquire; or rather you, gentlemen, are to find the facts proved in court against us. and the judges are to fee and confider what the law pronounces touching our offence, and what punishment is thereby inflicted as a penalty."

Mr. John Adams, in his pleadings, produces from the best authorities, those rules of law which must govern all cases of homicide, and particularly that which is before the court; and then confiders the evidence to fee whether any thing has occurred that may be compared to the rules of law. He enters into a minute confideration of every witness produced on the crown fide; and endeavours to show from the evidence on that side, that the asfault upon the party was fufficiently dangerous to justify the prisoners; at least, that it was sufficiently provoking to reduce to manflaughter the crime even of the two, who are supposed to be proved guilty of having killed. He then proceeds to confider the testimonies of the witnesses for the prisoners; and concludes with-" I will enlarge no more on the evidence, but fubmit to you, gentlemen .- Facts are flubborn things; and whatever may be our withes, our inclinations, or the dictates of our passions, they cannot alter the state of facts and evidence: nor is is the law less stable than the fact. If an affault was made to endanger their lives, the law is clear, they had a right to kill in their own defence. If it was not so severe as to endanger their lives, yet if they were affaulted at all, struck and abused by blows of any fort, by snow-balls, oyster-shells, cinders, clubs or sticks of any kind; this was a provocation, for which the law reduces the offence of killing, down to manslaughter, in consideration of those passions in our nature, which cannot be eradicated.—

" The law, in all viciflitudes of government, fluctuations of the passions, or slights of enthusiasm, will preserve a sleady undeviating course; it will not bend to the uncertain wishes, imaginations, and wanton tempers of men. To use the words of a great and worthy man, a patriot, and an hero, an enlightened friend of mankind, and a martyr to liberty, I mean ALGERNON SIDNEY, who from his earliest infancy sought a tranquil retirement under the shadow of the tree of liberty, with his tongue, his pen, and his fword. " The law (fays he) no passion can diflurb. 'Tis void of defire and fear, luft and anger. 'Tis mens fine affectu; written reason; retaining some measure of the divine perfection. It does not enjoin that which pleafes a weak, frail man, but without any regard to perfons, commands that which is good, and punishes evil in all, whether rich or poor, high or low. 'Tis deaf, inexorable, inflexible." On the one hand it is inexorable to the cries and lamentations of the prisoners; on the other it is deaf, deaf as an adder to the clamors of the populace."

The judges, when fumming up the evidence to the jury, and giving their opinions of the constructions of law upon the evidence, apply themselves to the removing of those bad impressions, which may possibly have been made upon the jury by the misconstruction of scripture passages. Says one of them-" In the course of this year you doubtless have heard much of the law given to the Tews, respecting homicide, as well as of the precept given to Noah, that whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed. Whence it has been inferred, that whosoever voluntarily kills another, whatever the inducement or provocation may be, is a murderer, and as fuch ought to be put to death.-But furely not only the avenger of blood, and he who killed a thief breaking up a house in the night, were exceptions to that general precept, but also he who killed another in his own defence. Even the Jewish doctors allowed this, and that justly; because the right of self-defence is founded in the law of nature." It appears upon the trial, that the facts related above, under the fifth of March, are well attested. There are no less than thirtyeight witnesses to prove a design to attack the soldiers, six of whom the council for the king have produced. Nigh thirty witneffes have fworn to words of provocation uttered against the prisoners, as during them to fire, and threatening to kill them; and twenty-five have witnessed to ice, snow-balls, slicks, &c. being thrown at them, ten of whom are witnesses for the crown. There is evidence that Patrick Carr, one of the deceafed, repeatedly declared, and confirmed the fame but a few hours before he died—that he went with a defign against the foldiers; that he thought they were abused and would have fired before; that he forgave and did not blame the man, whoever he was, that fhot him; that he blamed himself for going to the riot, and might have known better, for he had feen foldiers called to quell riots, but never faw any bear half fo much before. The jury withdraw for about two hours and a half. Upon comparing the evidence, they cannot be convinced that the foldiers were not too hally in firing. Was there evidence of all having fired, they would convict all of manslaughter; but it is agreed on all hands, that no more than feven guns were fired, confequently one is innocent, and they choose that the guilty shall escape rather than one innocent person be convicted *. They return into court and agree, that as to Wemms, Hartegan, M'Cauley, White, Warren and Carrol, they are not guilty, on which they are immediately discharged. As to Killroy and Montgomery, they agree that they are not guilty of murder, but of man slaughter. Both pray the benefit of clergy, which is allowed; each is burnt in the hand, in open court, and discharged. [Dec. 5.] The trial has been long, but the iffue of it, as well as of that of the captain's, may be brought in proof of the integrity of Boston juries, venturing to give upright verdicts in defiance of popular opinions.

[Dec. 12.] Edward Manwaring, efq; John Munroe, gentleman, Hammond Green, boat builder, and Thomas Greenwood, labourer, were tried for being prefent, aiding, affifling, &c. William Warren in the murder of Crifpus Attucks. The whole evidence confifted in one witness's declaring that he faw two flashes from the custom-house, one from the balcony, the other from a chamber window, and a person in the balcony with a gun or pislos in his hand; and in the testimony of a French boy, servant to Mr. Manwaring, who swore to his being at the custom-house when the soldiers fired, and to a story of persons firing out of the chamber window. The falshood of the whole evidence was immediately detected by a number of the most creditable witnesses, so that the jury acquitted the prisoners without going from their feats.

In the pleadings upon the trials, (of the foldiers especially) Mr. John Adams discussed the subject of homicide so largely, and showed so fully by what a variety of circumstances it was reduced to manslaughter, that the popular leaders perceived the necessity of altering their plan of opposition to the military, and from thence forward promoted a particular attention to the militia and the manual exercise, that the country might be qualified for repelling arms by arms, whenever the same should be requisite for the preservation of their liberties.

The ferment occasioned by the ministerial measures did not fubfide in the New-York colony any more than in the Massa-

About the middle of January, and at night, the liberty pole was cut down by the foldiery, which enraged the inhabitants, and produced much disturbance and riot afterward between them and the troops. The foldiers posted up papers about the city against the fons of liberty, which occasioned a considerable affray.-The opposition foon expressed their determination to persevere, by creeting a new liberty pole, strongly secured with iron to prevent its being demolished. The May poles in different parts of the continent had changed their names, or given place to liberty poles, after the exhibition upon the liberty tree at Boston during the stamp-act. The conduct of the foldiers was probably owing to the measures which had been taken the preceding month, in order to prevent the affembly's granting money for the support of the troops. The affembly had in their former fession, voted to fupply his majesty's troops quartered in the colony, which gave great umbrage. To quiet the people they made a unanimous declaration, that it should be the last supply they would ever grant, until their grievances were redreffed, and it gave fatisfaction. But the house in the present session, passed a vote for a further fupply of 2000l. which greatly inflamed the minds of the inhabitants. Two papers were published upon the occafion: the one addressed to the betrayed inhabitants of the city and colony of NEW-YORK, and signed A SON OF LIBERTY: the other figned LEGION, defiring the inhabitants to meet in the fields. The papers were voted falle, feditious, and infamous libels by the affembly, who defired the lieutenant governor to iffue out proclamations, offering rewards for the discovery of the authors, 1001. for the first, and 501. for the last. A stripling who had been journeyman to the printer of the first, but discharged for bad behaviour, allured by the proffered reward, lodged a complaint against his late master, who was terrified into a discovery of Mr. M' Dougall as the publisher. Mr. M' Dougall was by the chief juilice's warrant brought before him, and upon refufing to give bail was committed to jail. [Feb. 8.] In confequence of the fecond paper, about 1400 inhabitants met, and appointed Mr. John Lamb to propound questions relative to the vote of the allembly. After explaining it, the question was put, "Do you approve of the vote?" No was the answer. He proceeded. "Are you for giving money to the troops, on any confideration whatfoever?" It was again No. There were but about half a dozen for the affirmative upon either of the questions. He then asked, "Will you appoint a committee to communicate the whole of this transaction to your members?" Yes was the word. They then appointed for the committee, Messrs. Isaac Sears, Cafper Wistar, Alexander M'Dougall, Jacobus Van Zandt, Samuel Broome, jun. Erasmus Williams, and James Van Vaurk.— The meeting in the fields, and the transactions at it, were several weeks before the difcovery and commitment of Mr. M'Dougall. Mr. Lamb was called before the house to answer for his conduct; but in the mean time the committee wrote to the speaker, acknowledging themselves, in every respect, parties with him, and answerable for each step that had been taken, and ready to defend their conduct in a conflitutional manner. When Mr. Lamb appeared before the affembly, he told them that he had affembled with the rest of his fellow citizens, and had proposed questions, which as a citizen, a freeman, and an Englishman, he had a right to do, and was surprised to hear it controverted. The house finding that they had to do with men of fense and resolution, who were determined upon supporting the rights of their countrymen and fellow citizens, gave up the point and dismissed them. Their vote of 200cl. for the troops foon passed into a law; but the deficiency demanded by the lieutenant governor as arrears amounting to upward of 1000l. was left unpaid. Had there been a provision for the arrears, the compliance with the mutiny act would have been formal and complete. That matters were carried fo far must be attributed to an extraordinary and fudden coalition in the affembly between politicians, who had long been at mortal variance.

[April.] The grand jury found a bill against captain M'Dougall, but the trial was put off; and he was bailed out of jail.— When the house met again toward the close of the year, he was ordered to attend at their bar. The speaker asked him whether he was the author or publisher of the address, &c. He declined answering, and assigned his reasons. It was resolved, that in his reply he denied the authority of the house, and was therefore guilty of a high contempt. On his refusing to ask pardon of the house, he was ordered into custody, and the speaker issued his warrant to the jail-keeper of the city to receive and keep him prisoner until he shou d be discharged by due course of law. He remained in jail till the affembly was prorogued on the 25th of the following February, 1771, when he was enlarged after a confinement of near three months. It was not till March the 27th that he was discharged from his recognizance, by the supreme court then fitting at New-York, (without having been brought to a trial) after having been under bonds for near twelve months, and fuffered twenty and three weeks actual imprison-He was the first sufferer for liberty after the commencement of the united efforts of the American fons, to frustrate the ministerial plans for encroaching upon, and eventually subverting their long claimed and enjoyed rights and privileges. This honor belongs to a gentleman born in Scotland, and who is indeed, what he' figned himself, A Son of Liberty. He bore his imprisonment with fortitude; but the disagreeableness of it was much lessened, and the disgrace of it wholly removed, as the citizens of the highest and best characters, sadies and gentlemen, reforted to the place of his confinement. His character as well as his cause was good; so that the most virtuous espousers of the latter, were neither afraid nor ashamed, by their repeated visits, to afford him their public countenance.

The Maffachusetts again demands your attention.

[May 31.] The new general court met at Cambridge; the house remonstrated against being held there, or at any other place than Boston; and by a majority of 69 out of 102, voted it to be a very great grievance, and resolved not to do business out of Boston;

on which the lieutenant-governor prorogued them.

[July 25.] They met again, but the affembly refused to do busines; and in their message to Mr. Hutchinson, insisted upon the right of people to appeal to heaven in disputes between them and persons in power, when there is an abuse of power; but they softened what they advanced, by saving "We would, however, by no means be understood to suggest, that this people have occasion at present to proceed to such extremity; and yet they afterward added, "these and other grievances and cruesties, too many to be here enumerated, and too melancholy to be much longer borne by this people, we have seen brought upon us by the devices of the ministers of state." They were prorogued afresh.

[Sept. 26.] They met a third time. The lieutenant-governor told them that the garrifon at the cassle in the pay of the province was to be withdrawn by order of his majesty, and the fortress to be garrisoned by his regular forces. His orders were to deliver the possession of the fort to such officer as general Gage should direct to take the command of it. The information excited a fuspicion in the affembly, who despaired of obtaining a removal to Boston by perfishing in a refusal to do business; the leaders therefore procured this vote: [Sept. 29.] "Refolved, that the next Wednesday (Oct. 3) be observed by the two houses as a day of prayer, to feek the Lord for his direction and bleffing," which went up to the council, and was unanimously concurred. Men of profane cast are too prone to ridicule religion, because of its being made a stalkinghorse to serve the purposes of politicians. Would they confine their wit and fatire to the parties offending, the correction would be proper. But let not the well-intentioned and undefigning children of devotion, be charged with hypocritical canting, because they are imposed upon and duped by the fubtilty of guides, who, like most thoroughpaced politicians, can change themselves into angels of light, that they may perfect their devices.

Oct. q. The house resolved to proceed to business from abfolute necessity, protesting against the restraint the general court was held under to do it out of Boston. A few days after, they fent to the lietenant-governor to know whether he held the command at the Castle. " If the custody and government of that fortress," faid they, "is now lodged with the military power, independent of the supreme civil magistrate within this jurisdiction, it is fo effential an alteration of the constitution as must justly alarm a free people." His answer was so worded, as to leave the affembly, in general, ground for concluding, that the military in the castle were dependent upon himself the same as were the provincials. When he delivered it up, he repaired thither, fent for the keys, and upon colonel Dalrymple's coming into the flate room with his officers, gave them to him, and lodged with him the cuffody and government of the fort; but retained fome trifling appearances of fuperior command. He foon learnt however, that he could not come at a flag when in want of it, or even oars for a boat, without applying to general Gage.

[Nov. 6.] The reprefentatives refolved, that the merchants having receded from their non-importation agreement, $\mathcal{C}c$, they would difcourage prodigality, extravagance, and the use of foreign superfluities; and promote industry, frugality, and their own manufactures in the several towns they represented.

[7.] They appointed a committee of correspondence to communicate intelligence to the agent and others in Great-Britain, and to the speakers of the several assemblies through the continent, or fuch committees as they have appointed or may appoint.

Before the licutenant-governor prorogued them, he observed to them, that fince they had discovered a resolution to remove unnecessary obstacles, they had done more business, notwith-standing all the inconveniencies from the place of holding the court, which they had insisted upon, than he remembered to have been done in the like space of time, since he had shared in public affairs.

[April 3, 1771.] The following spring session produced nothing very material, but afforded him the pleasing opportunity of acquainting the general court, in form, of his being appointed captain-general and commander in chief over the province. The council presented a congratulatory address, and expressed their satisfaction at his appointment. Upon the question in the house of assembly, whether to appoint a committee to prepare an address, there was a negative. The house however, asterward requested the removal of the general court to Boston, which was not granted.

[May 29.] They met, as the year before, at Cambridge. In three weeks the affembly protested against his excellency's convening them there, and afterward appointed a committee of cor-

[July 4.] The governor informed the house, that by his majesty's instruction, he was forbidden giving his consent to such an act as subjects the officers of the crown to be taxed, by the affessor in the towns where they reside, for the profits which they receive from their commissions, although their offices have no relation to the province, so that the tax-bill must be qualified.

[5.] The house, by message, expressed their surprise and alarm at the reason assigned for his not affenting to the tax-bill, and said, "We know of no commissioners of his majesty's customs, nor of any revenue his majesty has a right to establish in North-America. We know and seel a tribute levied and extorted from those, who, if they have property, have a right to the absolute

Had it been known, how infignificant the taxes were which the officers of the crown were required to pay, it is hard to conceive how wisions could have dictated such instruction, and have ventured to give a fresh disgust to those, who were already too much irritated. However, the governor's instructions did not oblige him to confine the general court to Cambridge, and he might have removed the a to Boston; but by showing a firmness in opposing their desire arthile they protested against the restraint

they were under, he meant to recommend himself to the ministry. By the same intention he was induced, in a great measure, to refuse his consent to the grants made to Mr. Bollan and Mr. De Berdi's executors by this assembly, as he had done in respect to those made by the preceding. These results ferved to keep up the animofity.

The disposition to import goods into the Massachusetts, in defiance of the laws of revenue and trade, and to support such practices by open violences upon the officers, whose duty it was to carry the laws into execution, broke out upon many occasions; and as usual, the magistrates declined giving their assistance and support, being in principle opposed to such laws, as sundamentally defective in point of restitude. The like disposition to import goods prevailed in the other colonies; but there was no call to go into the like open violences.

[Dec. 3.] Mr. Otis, jun. was carried off in a post-chaise, bound hand and foot, his reasoning powers being wholly deranged. This calamity, which somewhat lessens the weight of opposition to ministerial measures, is to be imputed, not to any effects of the affray with Mr. Robinson, but rather to the high tone given to his animal frame by the strength of his passions, and a failure in the point of temperance. The sons of liberty would have sustained an excessive loss, had this event taken place in the early stage of the opposition; but the times had brought so many able persons of similar sentiments into the general court, who had been training for sour years, and were conversant with the political management of public business, that the plans of the Massachusetts anti-governmental party suffered no derangement.

An opportunity now offers of mentioning, that Sir Alexander Gilmour, baronet, and George Dempster, esq; were the gentlemen who so nobly distinguished themselves by voting for the repeal of the stamp-act, while all the other Scotch members pre-

After what has been written and transmitted, you will judge yourself under an obligation to return me speedy information of all that is doing in Great-Britain, relative to the American colonies.

LETTER V.

Roxbury, June 25, 1773:

THE annual elections of the Maffachusetts were in favour of the friends to colonial liberty; but the flate of Mr. Otis's mind necessarily occasioned his being left out of the lift of the Boston representatives.

[May 28.] The general court still met at Cambridge, but the governor adopted a conciliating measure, in declining to negative Mr. Huncock, who was again chosen one of the council.—He had been repeatedly chosen, and till now as repeatedly negatived; he declined however, taking his seat at the board, choosing to remain in the assembly as one of the Boston members.

[June 13.] Mr. Hutchinson acquainted the house, in answer to a message, that his majesty had made provision for his support; and then, after requiring the opinion and advice of the council, upon their oaths, whether he might now remove the general court to Boston, consistent with the signification of his majesty's pleasure to him, and receiving their unanimous opinion and advice in the affirmative, adjourned them to meet at Boston. He might have asked and received that very advice long before.

A committee having been appointed to consider the matter of the governor's support being provided for by the king, reported and observed, [July 10.] "That the king's providing for the support of the governor is a most dangerous innovation. It is a measure whereby not only the right of the general assembly of this province is rescinded, but the highest indignity is thrown upon it. It is an infraction of the charter in a material point, whereby a most important trust is wrested out of the hands of the general assembly." And the house, the same day, declared by a message to the governor, "That the making provision for his excellency's support, independent of the grants and acts of the general assembly, and his excellency's receiving the same, is an infraction upon the rights of the inhabitants granted by the royal charter."

The payment of the governors by the crown, is not relished by the colonies, as it makes them entirely dependent upon that, and wholly independent of the people, and provincial affemblies: and as it destroys the mutual check which each branch of the legislature ought to have upon the others, and that balance of power which is essential to all free governments. It will be a new source of complaint. On the other hand, the assair which has happened in Rhode-Island government will prove a fresh pro-

Lieutenant Dudington, the commander of the late armed schooner the Gafbee, had been remarkably assiduous in supporting the laws against smuggling, and in searching after contraband goods. by which he had given great offence. He had also brought upon himself the resentment of many, by firing at the Providence packets (employed in transporting goods and passengers from thence to Newport, and vice verfa) in order to oblige the masters to take down their colours, and by chafing them even into the docks when it had been refused. The Providence packet coming up as usual with colours flying and company on board, probably a party of pleasure, as is frequent in the summer season, and refusing to take them down, the lieutenant fired a fhot, which being difregarded, he chased. [June 9.] It was near upon or quite high water. The packet flood in with the land as close as confifted with fafety, defigning that the Gaspee should be run a-ground in the chase. The design succeeded. The Gaspee was foon fast, and could not flir, the tide having done flowing. The packet proceeded to town. The fituation of the Gaspee, and resentment against the commander, excited the thought of attacking and destroying her. Mr. John Brown, a confiderable merchant of Providence, was the principal in the business. Captain Whipple was immediately employed to beat up for volunteers, and a number offered and engaged to go upon any fervice for which they were wanted. Several whale boats were procured and filled with armed men. Mr. Brown accompanied them in the expedition. Captain Whipple, as they proceeded, observed to Mr. Brown, that he might lose his life, and that he had a family, and therefore he required that care should be taken of them in case of his death. Mr. Brown engaged to do it should that happen. [June 10.] About two o'clock in the morning, they boarded and carried the schooner, as she lay a-ground about seven miles below Providence. Brown was himself the first on board. The lieutenant was wounded. He and the crew were put on shore, and every thing valuable belonging to him, was taken out and faved for him; after which the Gaspee, with all her stores, was burned.

Though a reward of five hundred pounds, together with a pardon, if claimed by an accomplice, has been offered by proclamation for discovering and apprehending any of the persons concerned; yet the commissioners appointed to try the matter, have transmitted accounts to ministry, that they can obtain no evidence. If any one had wished to give evidence, that he might get the reward; yet the thought that he should risk his life, or be obliged to sly the country and become a perpetual exile, would naturally have overcome fuch propenfity. It was too hazardous to turn informer. Some who were fecured, in expectation that they would give intelligence, were affilled by the populace in making their escape, before any thing material could be learnt from them by the commissioners.

Governor Hutchinson and his adherents having been used to represent the party in opposition, as only an uncally factious few in Boston, while the body of the people were quite contented; Mr. Samuel Adams was thereby induced to vifit Mr. Fames IV arren, of Plymouth. After converfing upon the fubject, the latter proposed to originate and establish committees of correspondence in the feveral towns of the colony, in order to learn the strength of the friends to the rights of the continent, and to unite and increase their force. Mr. Samuel Adams returned to Boston, pleafed with the propofal, and communicated the fame to his confidents. Some doubted whether the measure would prosper, and dreaded a disappointment which might injure the cause of libertv. But it was concluded to proceed. The prime managers were about fix in number; each of whom when separate, headed a division; the feveral individuals of which, collected and led distinct subdivisions. In this manner the political engine has been constructed. The different parts are not equally good and operative. Like other bodies, its composition includes numbers who act mechanically, as they are preffed this or that way by those who judge for them; and divers of the wicked, fitted for evil practices when the adoption of them is thought necessary to particular purposes, and a part of whose creed it is, that in political matters the public good is above every other confideration, and that all rules of morality when in competition with it, may be fafely dispensed with. When any important transaction is to be brought forward, it is thoroughly confidered by the prime managers. If they approve, each communicates it to his own division; from thence, if adopted, it passes to the several subdivisions, which form a general meeting in order to canvals the business. The prime managers being known only by a few to be the promoters of it, are defired to be prefent at the debate, that they may give their opinion when it closes. If they observe, that the collected body is in general strongly against the measure they wish to have carried, they declare it to be improper; is it opposed by great numbers, but not warmly, they advise to a reconfideration at another meeting, and prepare for its being then adopted; if the opposition is not considerable, either in number or weight of persons, they give their reasons, and then recommend the adoption of the measure. The principal actors are determined

ing in the attempt.

The news of his majefly's granting falaries to the justices of the fuperior court, afforded them a fair opportunity for executing the plan of establishing committees of correspondence through the colony. The most spirited pieces were published, and an alarm spread, that the granting such salaries tended rapidly to complete the fystem of their flavery.

[Nov. 2.] A town meeting was called, and a committee of correspondence appointed, to write circular letters to all the towns in the province, and to induce them to unite in measures. [Nov. 19: The committee made a report, containing feveral refolutions contradictory to the supremacy of the British legislature. After fetting forth, that all men have a right to remain in a flate of nature as long as they pleafe, they proceed to a report upon the natural rights of the colonists as men, christians and subjects: and then form a list of infringements and violations of their rights. They enumerate and dwell upon the British parliament's having affumed the power of legislation for the colonies in all cales whatever—the appointment of a number of new officers to fuperintend the revenues-the granting of falaries out of the American revenue, to the governor, the judges of the fuperior court, the king's attorney and folicitor general. port was accepted; copies printed, and fix hundred circulated through the towns and diffricts of the province, with a pathetic letter addressed to the inhabitants, who were called upon not to doze any longer, or fit supinely in indifference, while the iron hand of oppression was daily tearing the choicest fruits from the fair tree of liberty. The circular letter requested of each town a free communication of fentiments on the subjects of the report, and was directed to the felect men, who were defired to lay the fame before a town meeting, which has been generally practifed, and the proceedings of the town upon the bufiness have been transmitted to the committee at Boston. This committee have their particular correspondents in the several towns. who upon receiving any special information, are ready to spread it with dispatch among the inhabitants. It consists of twenty-one perfons, of heterogeneous qualities and professions. The governor, in expectation of exciting prejudice, and fixing a stigma upon them, their connections and proceedings, has written to a gentleman in power, "Strange that a government, which within a century would fuffer no perion to be free of the commonwealth who was not one of their church members, should now take for their leaders, men who openly contemn all religion, and should join deacons and atheifts in one trust; and that they fhould should be instigated to this by some of the clergy, who make the highest pretences to devotion; and yet the spirit of political party produces all this." He would gladly receive them all into his own arms, and be devoutly thankful for them, were they to change fides and join in supporting his administration. But he has unwarily acknowledged, that the government, or the great body of the people in their legislative and ruling capacity are in the opposition, which therefore cannot confift merely of a few factious leaders; and he appears not to have recollected that men of opposite principles and characters will unite heart and hand, in keeping off a general calamity, which will involve them all in one and the fame ruin. The towns in general have chosen committees of correspondence. and resolved in a stile agreeable to the wishes of the Bostonians. But the refolutions have not been alway drawn up by the townfmen. An inhabitant of Petersham applied to that worthy and difinterested fon of liberty, Mr. Quincy, whom you will recollect to have been of the council for captain Preston and the foldiers, for his affishance, and was furnished with the following draft intended for Boston, excepting the introduction and the paragraphs marked with a flar, which were added by some other

[Jan. 4, 1773.] At a meeting of the freeholders and other inhabitants of the town of Petersham in the county of Worcester, duly affembled according to law, held by adjournment on the 4th of January, 1773, the committee chosen the 30th ult. made the following report, viz. " The town having received a circular letter from the town of Bollon, respecting the present grievances and abominable oppressions under which this country groans, have thereupon taken into their most ferious consideration, the prefent policy of the British government and adminiflration, with regard to Great-Britain and these colonies; have carefully reviewed the mode of election, and the quality of the electors of the commons of that island; and have also attentively reflected upon the enormous and growing influence of the crown, and that bane of all free states, a standing army in the time of peace; and in confequence thereof are fully confirmed in opinion, that the ancient rights of the nation are capitally invaded, and the greatest part of the most precious and established liberties of Englishmen utterly destroyed: And whereas the parliament of Great-Britain, by various statutes and acts, have unrighteously diffressed our trade, denied and precluded us from the setting up and carrying on manufactures highly beneficial to the inhabitants of these territories; restricted and prevented our lawful intercourse and commerce with other states and kingdoms; have also made laws and inflitutions touching life and limb, in differifon of the ancient common law of the land; and moreover have in these latter times, robbed and plundered the honest and laborious inhabitants of this extensive continent of their property, by mere force and power; and are now draining this people of the fruits of their toil, by thus raising a revenue from them, against the natural rights of man, and in open violation of the laws of God.

This town in union with the worthy inhabitants of Boston, now think it their indispensable duty to confider of the premises and the prefent aspect of the times, and to take such steps as upon mature deliberation, are judged right and expedient, and here-

Refolved, That, with a governor appointed from Great-Britain (especially at this day) during pleasure, with a large stipend, dependant upon the will of the crown, and controlled by instructions from a British minister of state, with a council subject to the negative of such a governor, and with all officers, civil and military, subject to his appointment or consent, with a castle in the hands of a standing army, stationed in the very bowels of the land; and that amazing number of placemen and dependants, with which every maritime town already swarms, no people can ever be truly virtuous, free, or brave:

Refolved, That the parliament of Great-Britain, usurping and exercising a legislative authority over, and extorting an unrighteous revenue from these colonies, is against all divine and human laws. The late appointment of falaries to be paid to our superior court judges, whose creation, pay, and commission depend on mere will and pleasure, completes a system of bondage, equal to any ever fabricated, by the combined efforts of the ingenuity, malice, fraud and wickedness of man:

* Refolved, That it is the opinion of this town, that a defpotic arbitrary government is the kingdom of this world, as fet forth in the New Testament, and is diametrically opposite to the establishment of Christianity in a society, and has a direct tendency to sink a people into a profound state of ignorance and irreligion; and that, if we have an eye to our own and posterity's happiness, (not only in this world, but the world to come)

it is our duty to oppose such a government:

* And further refolved, That the depriving the colonies of their conflitutional rights, may be fitly compared to the diffmembering the natural body, which will foon affect the heart; and it would be nothing unexpected for us to hear, that those very persons, who have been so active in robbing the colonies of their constitutional rights, have also delivered up the constitution of our mother country into the hands of our king:

Therefore

Therefore resolved, That it is the first and highest social dury of this people, to consider of, and seek ways and means, for a speedy redress of these mighty grievances and intolerable wrongs; and that for the obtaining of this end, this people are warranted, by the laws of God and nature, in the use of every rightful art and energy of policy, flratagem and force.

* And while we are thus under these awful frowns of divine Providence, and involved as this people are in heavy calamities, which daily increase in number and severity, it is highly becoming towns and individuals to humble themselves before Almighty God, seriously to commune with their own hearts, and seek carefully with tears, for the causes of the prevailing distresses of the land; and while it is apparent, that pristine piety and purity of morals, have given place to infidelity, diffipation, luxury, and groß corruption of mind and morals, there is a loud call for humility, lamentings and reformation; and it is at this time eminently incumbent on one and all, to feek at the throne of the great God for those special and remarkable interpositions of divine Providence, grace and mercy, which have so often faved New-England from both public and private diffress and misery: and as there is great reason to believe, that in past times we have too much depended upon the exertions of worldly wisdom and political devices, it becomes us in our present melancholy situation, to rely no longer on an arm of flesh, but on the arms of that all-powerful God, who is able to unite the numerous inhabitants of this extensive territory, as a band of brothers in one common caufe-who can eafily give that true religion, which shall make us his people indeed; that spirit, which shall fit us to endure temporal hardships for the procurement of future happiness; that spirit of valor and irresistible courage, which shall occasion our aged and our youth to jeopard their lives with joy, in the high places of the field, for his name and fervice fake, for the preservation also of this goodly heritage of our fathers, for the fake of the living children of our loins, and the unborn millions of posterity.

* We believe that there are very many, who in these days have kept their integrity and garments unspotted, and hope that God will deliver them and our nation for their sake. God will not suffer this land, where the gospel hath slourished, to become a slave of the world; he will slir up witnesses of the truth; and in his own time spirit his people to sland up for his cause, and deliver them. In a similar belief, that patriot of patriots the great Algernon Sidney lived and died, and dying breathed a like sentiment and prophecy, touching his own and the then approaching times, a prophecy however not accomplished until a glorious revolution.

Approved of by vote of the town, without contradiction.

SYLVANUS How, per order.

The governor, instead of over-looking in his speech, the proceedings of the towns, has been induced by them to broach the dispute about the supremacy of the parliament; and has fallen into the snare, which probably some of the politicians had laid for him, expecting to get the majority of the general court to declare against it. He designed to recommend himself to the ministry by obtaining a victory; but they will not thank him for increasing their embarrassiments.

[Jan. 25.] The council in their answer, said, "The stampact with some preceding and succeeding acts of parliament, subjecting the colonies to taxes without their consent, was the original cause of all the uncasiness that has happened since, and has occasioned also an inquiry into the nature and extent of the authority by which they were made."

This was the truth. When the flamp-act took place, "fome people, under the notion of zeal for liberty, ran into the most exceffive licentiousness, and were guilty in one place and another of the most lawless, unjust, and tyrannical proceedings; such as pulling down and destroying houses, abusing persons, endangering men's lives destroying their property, breaking windows, delivering prisoners out of the hands of justice, putting many into great fear, all contrary to the laws of the province: but there was nothing of this kind before *." Let me add, that in all my refearches, not an inflance has occurred to me of the mob's having been the death of a fingle individual, though they might have proceeded to the most criminal lengths also, had they not been gratified or diverted from their pursuits. But before that fatal act, there was not a more loyal, orderly, and peaceable people, than the Americans in general, through the whole British empire. All ranks and conditions gloried in their connection with Great Britain; rejoiced in her friendship and protection,; and triumphed in her prosperity.

Toward the close of their answer, the house of assembly expressed a concern at their having been reduced by the speech to the unhappy alternative, either of appearing by their silence to acquiesce in the governor's sentiments as to the supremacy of parliament, or of freely discussing the point. The house might be concerned; but the leaders were pleased with the opportunity.

The governor replied; and the house in their rejoinder told him "Although the colony may have submitted fub filentio to some acts of parliament, that they conceived might operate for their benefit, they did not conceive themselves bound by any of its acts, which they judged would operate to the injury of individuals." The people at large believe, that the house has the best of the argument, and are consirmed in their opposition to the claims of parliament.

The house voted the usual falaries to the judges of the superior court early in the fession. The governor delayed giving his affent to the grants; which produced a message to him requesting his making known the difficulty that prevented his allenting; to this it was answered, that he had received information, that his majesty had been pleased to order falaries to be allowed to the justices of the superior courts, &c. By this answer the bouse gained the opportunity of fending a fecond message, [Feb.] in which they expressed their resentment at the many attempts made, effectually to render null and void those clauses in their charter, upon which the freedom of their conflitution depends; and faid that they were more and more convinced, that it had been the defign of administration to introduce an arbitrary government into the province. They declared at the close, their impatience to know, " that the justices will utterly refuse ever to accept of support in a manner so justly obnoxious to the people of the province, it being repugnant to the charter, and utterly inconfishent with the safety of the rights, liberties, and properties of the people." To add the greater weight to their fentiments, and make them the more regarded by all persons. they came to feveral refolves, [March 3.] respecting the salaries and the judges; among the rest, " that their dependence on the crown, especially while they hold their commissions during pleasure, tends to the subversion of justice and equity, and to introduce oppression and despotic power; and that while they hold during pleafure, any who shall accept of and depend upon the pleasure of the crown for his support, independent of the grants of the general court, will discover that he is an enemy to the constitution, and has it in his heart to promote the establishment of an arbitrary government in the province."

The measures pursued on each side the Atlantic are not calcu-

TTER VI.

London, August 7, 1773.

FRIEND G.

JOU will receive from me, without further application, re-L gular accounts of what is doing on this fide the Atlantic, in relation to the colonies.

The burning of the Gaspee schooner near Providence, has given the chief rife to " an act for the better fecuring his majefly's dock yards, magazines, thips, ammunition, and flores." If the button of a marine's coat, the oar of a cutter's boat, or the head of a cask belonging to the fleet, are included under the comprehensive term stores, then according to the act, a person wilfully and maliciously destroying, or aiding and affishing in destroying the same, is to suffer death on being convicted. But what will affect you more than all the rest is, that the act is extended to the colonies, and subjects a person to a trial at the pleasure of his majesty, his heirs or successors, in any shire or county in Great Your own feelings will furnish you with the best comment on this new extension of parliamentary power.

The supporting of the authority of parliament was the only cause assigned by the minister himself, for retaining the tea duty. at the very time when he acknowledged it to be as anti-commercial a tax, as any of those which he had repealed upon that prin-It now appears that government had fomething more in contemplation.

The East-India Company, feeling the bad effects of the colonial finuggling trade (occasioned by the retention of the duty) in the large quantities of tea which remained in their warehouses unfold, requested the repeal of the three-pence per pound in America, and offered that, upon its being complied with, government should retain fix-pence in the pound on the exportati-Thus the company presented the happiest opportunity which could have offered, for honorably removing the cause of difference with America. Here was an opening for doing right, without infringing the claims on either fide. The company asked, and their fituation required relief. It could not be alledged, that it was done at the inflance of American discontent. nister was requested and intreated, by a gentleman of great weight in the company, and a member of parliament, to embrace the opportunity; but it has been rejected. New contriyances have been fet on foot to introduce the tea, attended with the

the three-penny duty, into all the colonies. Various intrigues and folicitations have been used to induce the chairman and depu y chairm a, to undertake this rash and foolish business. It has been protested against as contrary to the principles of the company's monopoly; but the power of ministry has prevailed; and the infignificant three-penny duty on tea is doomed to be the fatal bone of contention between Great-Britain and America. A bill has been passed into an act, [May 10.] for enabling the company to export their own teas. In confequence of it, they have adopted the fystem, and are become their own factors. They have come to a resolution of sending 600 chests of tea to Philadelphia, the like quantity to New-York and Boston, beside what is defigned for other places: feveral ships are accordingly freighted for different colonies, and agents appointed for the disposal of the commodity.

The feveral colonies will undoubtedly confider the scheme as calculated merely to circumvent them into a compliance with the revenue law, and thereby to open the door for an unlimited taxation; for if taxation can be established in this instance, it will be extended to others. Consequences will not fail to convince the minister, that it would have been far more eligible to have repealed the duty, than in this way to attempt its establishment. It will be needless for me to assure you, that you may upon all occasions command the assistance of Your. &c.

N. B. Some of the captains have refused to take the tea on board.

Roxbury, March 28, 1774.

DEFORE you have an account of the American proceedings B in respect to the teas of the East-India Company, you must be presented with some matters of an earlier date.

[May 14, 1773.] The Bostonians persisted in discovering on every occasion, a determined opposition to ministerial measures. Twelve days before the election day the town refolved, "That if the council apply for Faneuil-hall for to dine in on the anniversary election day, the select men should not grant it but upon the express conditions, that neither the commissioners of the customs, nor their attendants, nor the officers of the army and navy, stationed here for the purpose of ensorcing unconstitutional acts of parliament by military execution, be invited." It has been an established custom for the governor, council, and many other gentlemen, to dine there on that day; but the refolve prevented an application, and occasioned their dining esse-where, with the commissioners and officers. Whether the votes of Boston sent to Virginia, as the patriots fay, or their own private letters might or might not lead to it, the house of burgesses resolved, in the beginning of March, to maintain an intercourse with the fister colonies. They therefore appointed a committee of eleven persons, "whose business it should be to obtain the most early and authentic intelligence of all fuch acts and refolutions of the British parliament, or proceedings of administration, as may relate to or affect the British colonies, and to keep up and maintain a correspondence and communication with their fifter colonies." They then refolved. "That their speaker transmit to the speakers of the different affemblies their resolutions, to be laid before their assemblies, and requesting their appointing committees." Nothing could be more acceptable to the Maffachufetts affembly. It was the first particular bufiness they entered upon when they met. [May 28.] They came to several resolves, and were careful in the first to speak highly in praise of Virginia. They appointed a committee of fifteen members, and directed them "to prepare a circular letter to the speakers, requesting them to lay the same before their respective assemblies, in confidence that they will comply with the wife and falutary resolves of the house of burgesses of Virginia." Connecticut, Rhode-Island, Maryland, and New-Hamp-Shire, entered into fimilar measures; but the answer ordered by the New-Hampshire affembly, to be given to the speakers of Virginia and Rhode-Island, was guardedly expressed; they gave asfurance, that their fifter colonies might rely upon their fincerely joining them in every conflitutional plan for fecuring the rights of America. The inftitution of these committees tends greatly to unite the colonies, and to render them more alert and formidable in refifting the encroachments of ministry. They by this mean become early prepared to meet new and unexpected occurrences; and are drawn in to look upon themselves as jointly interested in each others safety, and public concerns.

An event has happened in the Maffachufetts, which has excited on the part of the people, the utmost indignation and animosity; on the fide of the governor and others, the greatest confusion.

The agent, Dr. Franklin, has by some means yet unknow obtained and fent over to Mr. Bowdoin a number of letters, . be communicated by him after perufal, to a few trufty gentlemen, viz. the honorable James Pitts, Mr. Thomas Cuthing, Mr. Samuel Adams, Dr. Winthrop, Dr. Chauncy, and Dr. Cooper: it is added, they are to be returned and put into the place whence they were taken. The letters are figned Tho. Hutchinfon, And. Oliver, Ch. Paxton, Thomas Moffat, Robert Achmuty, Nuch. Rogers, George Rome. Though they were partly private and confidential, they were defigned to procure public coercive meafures; and tended to incense the mother country against her colonies, and by the steps recommended, to widen the breach, which they have undoubtedly effected. Their contents were the fubject of conversation and folicitous inquiry; till at length Mr. Sam. Adams acquainted the affembly, [June 2.] that he had perceived the minds of the people to be greatly agitated with a prevailing report, that letters of an extraordinary nature had been written, and fent to England, greatly to the prejudice of this province—that he had obtained certain letters, which with the confent of the gentleman from whom he had received them, might be read in the house under certain restrictions, namely, that the faid letters be neither printed nor copied in whole or in part: the propofal was confidered, and they were read under the faid restrictions. A committee of the whole house afterward reported, "that the tendency and defign of faid letters was to overthrow the constitution of this government, and to introduce arbitrary power into the province:"-Yeas 101, Nays 5.

The restrictions under which the letters were communicated, were invalidated by contrivance; and in a week's time, [June 9.] Mr. Hancock acquainted the house, that he had received copies of certain letters, which he supposed were copies of the letters before the house, and moved that they might be compared. The next day, [June 10.] one of a committee appointed to confider fome means whereby the house might be honorably and fully posfeffed of the letters, reported, "That Mr. S. Adams had acquainted him, that having converfed with the gentleman from whom he received the letters, he was authorifed to inform the house, that the said gentleman consented (as he found that copies of faid letters were already abroad, and had been publicly read) that the house should be fully possessed of them, to print, copy, or make what use of them they pleased, relying on the goodness of the house, that the original letters be returned, they retaining attested copies for their use." Mr. S. Adams being called upon, declared the same. [June 16.] At length the affembly refolved to petition the king to remove governor Hutchinson and lieutenant-governor Oliver for ever from the government of the province. [June 22.] They agreed also to furnish the council with the original letters upon the express condition, that the board would by no means suffer them to go out of their hands. The council complied with the insulting stipulation aimed at the governor; and upon his requiring the letters for examination, resused to deliver them into his hands, but fent a committee to open them before him, that he might examine the hand-writing. [June 24.] To this indignity he was obliged to submit, as well as to the mortification of acknowledging the signature. After which they resolved, "that the removal of the governor and lieutenant-governor will be promotive of his majesty's service."

The Boston committee of correspondence, that they might add weight to the doings of the general court, inclosed the governor's letters and also the resolves of the house, in a spirited circular letter, and sent them to the several town clerks through the province to be communicated to their respective towns.

The house of assembly in their petition and remonstrance to his majesty, charged the governor and lieutenant governor with being betrayers of their trusts and of the people they governed, and with giving private, partial, and false information; declared them enemies to the colony: and prayed for justice against them and for their speedy removal. So prevalent was the resentment, that these charges with many others, were carried through by a majority of 82 to 12.

To enter now upon the subject of the TEA. While the bill for allowing the East-India Company to export it was in parliament, letters from Britain infinuated into the minds of the colonists, that a plan was laid to bring them into a fnare; that a noble refiftance on this occasion would free them from the flavery intended for them; that if this opportunity was lost they would never have another; and that if they fuffered the ships to land the tea and the duty to be paid, they would rivet their own chains. The British merchants have been alarmed with the thought of the losses, which must necessarily accrue to themselves from the exportations of the company, and from the fales going through the hands of confignees; and have contributed to the flrengthening of that refiftance to which the people were already inclined, through their prevailing jealoufy at the refervation of the tea duty when the other duties were repealed. The united opposition of the colonies was to be fecured; but the event was precarious. The Boftomans were much suspected by the sons of liberty in the other provinces, on account of the many goods which were imported into the town during the general non-importation agreement, and afterward afterward of the teas contrary to the agreement respecting that article. New-York and Philadelphia had kept to the agreement, and had run all the teas that the market demanded: but there had been imported into Boston, from the beginning of 1768 to the end of last year, not less than 2714 chests, by more than a hundred different persons. Mr. Hutchinson and his sons were considerable importers. It was evident that the body of merchants could not be depended upon. Mr. Thomas Mifflin, of Philadelphia, being at Boston, put it therefore to the sons of liberry, when the teas were expected, "Will you engage that they shall not be landed? If so, I will answer for Philadelphia." They pledged their honor.

[Oct. 2.] The inhabitants of Philadelphia affembled and unanimoufly entered into various refolves, in which they cenfured the resolution of the East-India company to send out their tea to America, subject to the payment of duties on its being landed, as an open attempt to enforce the ministerial plan, and a violent attack upon the liberties of America; and declared it to be the duty of every American to oppose this attempt, and that whoever should directly or indirectly countenance it, was an enemy to his country. They then fixed upon a committee to wait on the gentlemen, reported to be appointed to receive and fell the tea, and to request their resigning. Within three days the whole number refigned; Meilrs. Whartons and Brown, without making the least difficulty; the other two not, till the treatment they met with (on appearing at the coffee-house) for the shuffling anfwer they had given, convinced them that it was not fafe trifling with the public opinion. Since this meeting, the Boston sons of liberty have affured by letter the fons of liberty at Philadelphia. that no tea shall be landed.

At New-York, when captain Sears and captain M'Dougall heard that the tea was to be fent, they concluded that an opposition to it was necessary, and agreed upon contriving to unite the tea-fmugglers, the merchants, and the fons of liberty in that fervice; and that captain M'Dougall should write against the design of introducing and vending the tea agreeable to the ministerial plan, but should remain concealed as the author. A few of each class were called together, and the mode of opposition settled. Publications, tending to spread and increase the alarm of imminent danger to the liberties of the country, appeared periodically. As the time approached for the arrival of the tea thips, the publications became more spirited and threatening. [Nov. 5.] An hand-bill addressed to the friends of liberty and commerce was circulated through the city, calculated to provoke resentment against all the encouragers of the tea plan. Afterward written papers were fluck up at the coffee-house and other places [Nov. 8.] menacing destruction to any person who should accept a commission for the sale of the East India company's teas, or he an accessary. In rather more than a week, there was publithed [Nov. 18.] a paper figned Legion, addressed to the stated pilots of the port, and all others whom it might concern, directing them how to proceed in reference to any tea ship, and requiring them at their peril, to bring her no farther than the Hook. In another paper, figned the Mohawks, the tea ship is faid to be laden with fetters, forged for them in Great Britain, and every vengeance is denounced against all persons, who dare in any manner to contribute to the introduction of these chains. In December, the London, captain Chambers, and the tea thip arrived on the same day; the former came up directly to the wharf. the other remained at the Hook, and was watched till she returned, by a vessel stationed there for the purpose. On her arrival a committee waited on the confignees, who agreeable to a former promife affured them, that they would neither receive nor fell the tea, as it came liable to an American duty. Captain Chambers ventured to bring feventeen chests on a private account, which were taken and thrown overboard into the harbour. Had the company's ship come to the wharf, she would probably have been burnt, for captain Sears and five others had determined upon it, and provided themselves with combustibles for that purpose.

At Philadelphia, printed papers were dispersed, warning the Delaware pilots not to conduct any of the tea ships into harbour, as they were only sent for the purpose of enslaving and poisoning all the Americans; and at the same time plainly intimating, that it was expected they would apply their knowledge of the river, under the colour of their profession, so as effectually to secure

In most places, the confignees were obliged to relinquish their appointments, and to enter into engagements not to act in that capacity; and no other persons daring to receive the cargoes configned to them, the captains of the New-York and Philadelphia thips, from these circumstances, and the knowledge of the risk they ran from the determined resolution of the people, concluded upon returning directly to Great-Britain, without entangling themselves by any entry at the custom-houses. But it was otherwise in the Massachusetts.

Methods were taken to spirit up the people at large by fugitive pieces, hand-bills, resolves of town meetings, the mutual intercourse of committees and the like. [Nov. 3.] At length, some hundreds of the inhabitants of Boston and the neighbouring towns, meet at Liberty-tree, agreeable to a notification issued the day before, "for to hear the confignees refign and fwear that they will reship any teas, that may by the East-India company be assigned to them." The confignees are in general obnoxious to the public by reason of their near and intimate connections with the governor, on whose support they depend. They are not terrified into an appearance at the place propofed; but meet together by agreement at the flore of Mr. Clark, who is one of them, in King-street. A committee is appointed by the assembly to wait upon them with a meffage, to which they pay no regard. The people, who attend the committee as spectators, upon this force open the doors of the ware-house, and enter with great violence; and then attempt getting up flairs into the compting-house, but are driven back. [Nov. 5.] .The fons of liberty not having fucceeded in this procedure, a town-meeting of the freeholders and other inhabitants is called. A large number is collected; and it is agreed to adopt the refolves of the citizens of Philadelphia. A committee is chosen to wait upon the confignees, who decline complying with the request of the town by letters, which, though decent, are the next day voted daringly affronting, when the meeting is immediately disfolved. Some of the sons of liberty are fearful of pulhing the matter too far, lest the town, and then the colony, should be drawn into a quarrel with Great-Britain. To fuch it is faid, "It must come to a guarrel with Great-Britain and the colony, fooner or later; and if fo, what can be a better time than the prefent? Hundreds of years may pass away before the parliament will make such a number of acts in violation of the British constitution as it has done of late years, and by which it has excited fo formidable an opposition to the measures of ministry. Beside, the longer the contest is delayed, the more administration will be strengthened. Do not you observe, how the government at home are increasing their party here, by fending over young fellows to enjoy appointments, who marry into our first families and so weaken the opposition? By such like means, and by multiplying posts and places, and giving them to their own friends, or applying them to the corruption of their antagonists, they will increase their own force faster in proportion than the force of the country party will increase by population. If then we must quarrel, before we can have our rights secured, now is the most eligible period. Our credit also is at stake; we must venture, and unless we do, we shall be discarded by the fons of liberty in the other colonies, whose affishance we may expect upon emergencies, in case they find us steady, resolute and faithful." They conclude to venture onward.

Vol. I. Gg Nov.

[Nov. 18.] A new town-meeting is called, and a new committee appointed to wait upon the confignees to know, whether they will refign their appointment; to which they answer, " It is out of our power to comply with the request of the town." This answer may be built upon solemn engagements not to resign; otherwise it is hard to conceive how it should be more out of their power, than the power of the Philadelphia confignees, who have refigned fix weeks ago. It is a managed affair between them and the governor, who calls a council for advice [Nov. 10.] upon measures proper for preserving the peace, and for supporting the authority of government. While the council are debating a petition of the confignees is prefented, praying leave to refign themselves and the property committed to them, to his excellency and their honors as the guardians of the people. After debate, the further confideration is posiponed to the 23d, then to the 27th, then to the 29th, when the council make a few observations, decline complying with the petition, and advise his excellency to renew his orders to the justices and others, to exert themselves for the security of his majesty's subjects, the prefervation of peace and good order, and for preventing all offences against the law. About this time the configuees, confishing of the governor's fons; cousins, and particular friends, remove to the castle for personal safety. The day before the last meeting of the council, captain Hall in the Dartmouth, came to an anchor near the castle, having on board one hundred and fourteen chests of tea; and on the day of their meeting, comes into the harbour. On the fame day a notification is polled up in all parts of the town, inviting every friend to his country to meet at nine o'clock to make united refisfance to the most destructive measure of administration. The meeting of the people of Boston and the neighbouring towns is continued by adjournment to the next day, [Nov. 30.] when it is determined, that the tea shall be returned. Faneuil-hall being too fmall for the affembly, they adjourn to the Old South Meeting-house, and confirm the former determination by voting, " that the tea shall not be landed, that no duty shall be paid, and that it shall be sent back in the same bottom." They further vote, " that Mr. Rotch, the owner of the vessel, be directed not to enter the tea at his peril, and that captain Hall be informed, and at his peril not fuffer any of the tea to be landed." They also appoint a watch of twenty-five men to be a guard upon the Dartmouth, lying at Griffin's wharf. A letter is received from the configuees, offering to flore the teas till they can write and receive further orders; but the propofal is rejected. Mr. Greenleaf, the sheriff, appears and begs leave to read a proclamation from the governor, which requires the people forthwith with to disperse and to surcease all further proceedings. He is allowed to do it; and, upon finishing, there is a loud and general his: The people afterward vote, "that captain Bruce, on his arrival, do conform to the votes respecting Hall's veisel: that no tea from Great Britain be landed or fold till the act impoling the duty is repealed; that the captain of the prefent watch be defired to make out a lift for the next night, and fo on, until the veffels leave the harbour; that thould the watch be molefted, the inhabitan's be alarmed by the toiling of the bells at night, and the ringing of them in the day; that fix persons be appointed to give notice to the country towns, upon any important occasion; that every vessel arriving with tea have a proper watch, and that their brethren in the country be defired to afford their affiltance on the first notice." They determine to carry their votes and refolves into execution at the rifk of life and property; thank their brethren in the neighbouring towns, and then diffolve the meeting.

After the diffolution, the committee of correspondence for the town of Boston hold their meetings, and invite the like committees of the adjacent towns to join them; several do it; the whole jointly assume the direction of all that relates to the teas of the East India company. They keep a constant military watch of twenty-five men every night, generally with fire arms, to prevent the tea being privately landed. The vessels belonging to captains Bruce and Coffin, are upon their arrival ordered to Gris-

[Dec. 14.] The people of Boston and the neighbouring towns, that have agreed to act in concert with Boston, meet at the Old South Meeting-house, and conclude upon ordering Mr. Rotch to apply immediately for a clearance for his ship. Mean while the governor receiving intimation that she would be fent to sea, and that it might not be through the ordinary channel by the castle, acquaints admiral Montague and desires him to take the proper precautions, on which the admiral orders the Active and King Fisher to be fitted for sea, and to fall down and guard the passages out of the harbour. The governor likewise renews in writing his orders to colonel Leslie, to suffer no vessel, coasters excepted, to pass the fortress from the town without a permit signed by himself. A sufficient number of guns are loaded on this special occasion.

The affembly are acquainted, that the collector cannot give Mr. Rotch a clearance, until the veifel is discharged of dutiable articles. [Nov. 16.] Mr. Samuel Philips Savage, of Western, is chosen moderator. The number alsembled from town and country is thought to be some thousands. Upon the present crisis feveral gentlemen deliver their fentiments; and Mr. Jofiah Quincy, jun. his to the following purpose;—" It is not, Mr. Moderator, the spirit that vapors within these walls that must stand us in flead. The exertions of this day will call forth events, which will make a very different spirit necessary for our falvation. Whoever supposes, that shouts and hosannas will terminate the trials of the day, entertains a childish fancy. We must be grossly ignorant of the importance and value of the prize for which we contend; we must be equally ignorant of the power of those who have combined against us; we must be blind to that malice, inveteracy, and infatiable revenge, which actuate our enemies public and private, abroad and in our bosom, to hope that we thall end this controverfy without the sharpest, the sharpest conflicts-to flatter ourselves that popular resolves, popular harangues, popular acclamations, and popular vapor, will vanquish our foes. Let us consider the iffue. Let us look to the end.— Let us weigh and confider, before we advance to those measures. which must bring on the most trying and terrible struggle this country ever faw."

About three o'clock in the afternoon the question is put, "will you abide by your former resolutions with respect to not suffering the tea to be landed?" It passes in the affirmative, nem. con.

Mr. Rotch is ordered to make a protest, and procure a pass for his vessel. He waits upon the governor at Milton, who offers to give him a letter to the admiral for protection, which he declines, fearing in that case the rage of the people, and being in no concern about his ship, as that is not the object of resentment, but the tea. He intimates to the governor, that fome of the leaders of the people wish the ship to go down and be stopped at the cassie, " for then they will be rid of the affair, and may fay they have done all in their power." While Mr. Rotch is abfent, the speakers in the meeting keep the people together by engaging their attention till he returns, which is before fix o'clock, when he informs the body, that upon applying to the governor for a pass, he received for answer, " I cannot give you a pass consistent with the laws and my duty to the king unless the vessel is properly qualified from the custom-house."-Upon this there is a great deal of disputing, when a person disguifed like an Indian, gives the war-whoop in the front gallery, where there are few if any befides himfelf. Upon this fignal it is moved and voted that the meeting be immediately diffolved.— The people crowd out and run in numbers to Griffin's wharf. At the fame inflant, a number of persons, chiefly masters of veffels and thip-builders from the north end of the town, about feventeen venteen, though judged to be many more as they run along, cross Fort-Hill, dressed as Indians, and repair to the tea ships; and in about two hours hoist out of them and break open 342, chests of tea, and discharge their contents into the fast water.—

They are not in the least molested. The multitude of spe upon and about the wharf, serves as a covering party. The whole business is conducted with very little tumult, and no lamage done to the vessels or any other property; when fin shed, the people return quietly to their own towns and habitations.

Prior to the destruction of the tea, captain Loring in a brig, being the fourth and last vessel on the East-India Company's account, was cast ashore at Cape Cod; and what tea was saved has been conveyed to the castle.

The arrival of the tea ships first at Boston, the consignees refuling to relign, though they had the example of others to induce them, and the governor's refolution to pay no regard to the voice of the public, brought on the destruction of the tea. The fons of liberty were fensible, that if it was landed and stored, it would fome how or other obtain a fale; and that the virtue of the people, to decline buving and using a commodity to which they were fo attached from love and habit, was too precarious a ground on which to risk the salvation of their country. They have been obliged, but with the utmost reluctance, to venture upon a desperate remedy. Many of their friends, who are not acquainted with circumstances, or do not attend to them, may be ready to cenfure them feverely. But had the tea been landed, the union of the colonies in oppofing the ministerial schemes would have been diffolved; and it would have been extremely difficult ever after to have reflored it. The fulfilment of their folemn declaration, that the tea should not be landed, though in a way which would not have been chosen had any other effectual one offered, has fecured them the good opinion and confidence of their co-patriots in other parts. The governor has that influence with the confignees, that he could undoubtedly have prevailed on them to refign; but he has encouraged them to the contrary: and therefore what he has written, " It has been absolutely out of my power to prevent the destruction of the tea, without conceding to the unreasonable demands of a lawless set of men, and thereby giving government up and rendering myself obnoxious to my fovereign," will fcarce be admitted as a sufficient justification. Sovereigns themselves, upon fpecial emergencies, wifely give place to the opinions and withes of their subjects; but are often diffraced and forced into difficulties, through the want of like wildom in their reprefentatives. Had the governor given a pass for the ship in the present instance, he would not have been viewed by considerate persons, as breaking either the laws or his oath. Cases offer, when statute laws and oaths of office are required to give place to the fupreme law of fociety, the fafety of the community. Had he looked back to the time of the stamp-act, he would probably have found many precedents of thips having permits from his predeceffor in office, Sir Francis Bernard, to pass the castle without being duly qualified for want of stamps; and yet the granting them did not render Sir Francis obnoxious to his fovereign. But the truth was, Mr. Hutchinson had repeatedly urged government at home to be firm and perfevering; this was a favorite topic on which he was often infifting; he himself therefore could not think of yielding: and then he would not believe that the people were determined at all adventures to perfect their engagements; but expected that when the critical moment came, they would defift. Whereas when that moment came, and the tea on board the Dartmouth, captain Hall, was in danger of being feized and fecured by the custom-house officers, who might have been supported by admiral Montague, the sons of liberty projected the destruction of it in the manner above related: and in order to make short work of the whole business, and prevent their repeating the preceding formalities, they did not confine their operations to the tea on board the Dartmouth, but extended them to the teas brought in afterward by captains Bruce and Coffin.

Some expect that the destruction of the tea will issue in the destruction of the charter, which will make the inhabitants of the colony furious beyond expression. One gentleman, apprehenfive of the fatal confequences that will follow upon the parliament's meddling with the charter, the great darling of the people, has written freely and fully upon the subject to his correspondent, an influential member in the house. Another, being defirous of learning the real fentiments of the more moderate party, and of fuch as have not plunged themselves into the politics of the day, has converfed with feveral of them; but has discovered in them the warmest indignation and the highest refentment at the thought of being deprived of their charter. A major in the militia (whom Mr. Hutchinson honored with the commission, for his good conduct as foreman of the jury on the trial of the foldiers for killing the persons on the 5th of March, 1770) to'd him, "Sir, you know that I am a friend to government and wish to support it; but if there is an attempt to take away our charter, I will fight up to my knees in blood in defence of it." The g-ntleman has perceived fuch a spirit to predominate among all the people, that he has judged it right to communicate communicate his knowledge to Sir Francis Bernard, and to acquaint with his apprehensions as to the fatal consequences which will follow upon the adoption of violent measures. He has written also to another friend upon the subject, in hope that the intelligence will get to the ministry, and prove beneficial to the public, by preventing harsh proceedings. At Charleston the Carolinians have unloaded the tea, and stored it in cellars, where it cannot be used, and where it will finally perish.

Let me pass from hence to relate the doings of the Massachufettts assembly respecting the judges, which you will probably pronounce intemperate.

The house being informed, that each of the judges refused to take more than one half of the fuin granted them the last year, which they confidered as implying on the part of the judges, a determination to accept of their fupport from the crown, refolved, "That it is the incumbent duty of the judges explicitly to declare, whether they are determined to receive the grants of the general affembly or to accept of their support from the crown; and their delaying any longer to let the public know their determination, will discover that they have little or no regard for the peace and welfare of the province: and in fuch case it will be the indifpensable duty of the commons of this province to impeach them before the governor and council. Four of the judges, in the beginning of February, 1774, acquainted the house they had received their whole falary granted them by the general court, and not any part of the grant made by the crown, and that they were determined still to receive the grants of the general affembly; which was pronounced fatisfactory. But the chief justice, Peter Oliver, esq; sent them a letter [Feb. 3.] informing them, That fince being upon the bench feventeen years, he had fuffered above three thousand pounds sterling; that he had been encouraged not to refign with the hope of a support, but had never been relieved; that he had taken his majesty's grant from the 5th of July, 1772, to the 5th of January, 1774, and that without his majesty's leave he dare not refuse it.

[Feb. 11.] The house resolved, "That Peter Oliver hath, by his conduct, proved himself an enemy to the constitution of this province, and is become justly obnoxious to the good people of it; that he ought to be removed from the office of chief justice; and that a remonstrance and petition to the governor and council for his immediate removal be prepared"—yeas 96—

[Feb. 24.] The house proposed to exhibit articles of impeachment, in their own name and the name of all the inhabitants of the province, against the chief justice. His excellency excep-

ted to the proceedings of the house as unconstitutional; for which reason he could not give them any countenance.

[March 1.] They prepared articles of high crimes and mifdemeanors against the chief justice, to present to his excellency and the council, in which they said, "The salary and hopes of augmentation must have the effect of a continual bribe, and expose him to a violation of his oath. His accepting hath betrayed the baseness of his heart and the lust of covetousness, in breach of his engagements to rely solely on the grants of the assembly, necessarily implied and involved in his accepting said office. By receiving a grant out of the revenue unjustly extorted from the American colonies, he hath, as far as lay in his power, put a sanction on and established the said revenue, counter-acted the reasonable petitions of the people to his majesty, and in defiance of the known sense of the body of this people, hath wickedly endeavoured to increase the discontent and jealousies of this people and the grievance aforementioned."

[March 9.] It was resolved, "That the house have done all that in the capacity of representatives can be done for the removal of Peter Oliver; and it must be presumed, that the governor's refusing to take any measures therein is because he also re-

It is not to be thought, that the leading gentlemen in these proceedings expected to obtain the removal of the chief justice; but by the help of them, they rendered him and the governor more and more obnoxious to the body of the people; added to the dignity and importance of the house in the eyes of the representatives, by placing them upon an apparent level with the house of commons in Britain; and preserved the general animosity against ministerial measures from falling into a decline.

The real, genuine fentiments of the professed patriots may be desired; let me therefore mention, that these are divided in wish and opinion. The great body of them through the several colonies, and even in this, aim at no more than the removal of all the innovations since the expiration of the war. They want to have matters revert back to the state in which they were when the peace commenced; and to be fixed in that slate. They wish most ardently to continue in union with Great-Britain; and abhor the thought of a separation. They judge that it would be neither safe nor beneficial; that it is infinitely more eligible to have the protection of the mother country, and to remain under her shadow; and that no greater happiness can be enjoyed by them, than a thorough restoration of harmony and affection between them and the parent state, so as to obliterate the remembrance of all past animosity. But there are a few in this colony who hanker

after independency, and will be likely to bend their whole influence for the obtaining of it, whenever there is the least opening to encourage their efforts. At the head of these we must place Mr. Samuel Adams, who has long fince faid in small confidential companies-" The country shall be independent, and we will be fatisfied with nothing short of it." At one time his influence was fmall, owing to defects in pecuniary matters, especially as collector of the taxes for Boston, in which office he served for years. He was accountable to the town for between one and two thoufand pounds; but a great part of it had never been gathered. What with not preffing the payment of the taxes in time, as is too generally the case; not calling when the money happened to be ready and other casualties, no inconsiderable sum was lost. His necessities probably (for he appears to be addicted to no extravagances) urged him to supply himself, time after time, from the cash in hand, without attending to the accumulation of the balance against him, till called upon to fettle. The town had feveral meetings upon the bufiness; at length, by the exertion of his friends, a majority was obtained for the relinquishment of the demand upon him. Since his first election into the house in 1765, his influence has been gradually increasing, until he has obtained a great afcendency in directing the town of Boston, and the house of representatives, and consequently the council. His abilities and policy will foster the idea of independency, by the aids of those very severities the ministry may adopt, in order to compel the colonies into a fubmission to parliamentary authority in all cases whatever.

London, July 2, 1774.

THE letters fent over to the Maffachusetts by Dr. Franklin, have produced a duel between Mr. Whateley, the banker, brother to the late secretary to the treasury, and John Temple, esq; in which the former was dangerously wounded. This has led the doctor to inform the public, that both the gentlemen are totally ignorant and innocent, as to the transaction and its circum-Vol. I.

flances about which they fought. He declares that he alone was the person who obtained and transmitted to Boston the letters in question, and fays-" Mr. W. could not communicate them, because they were never in his possession; and for the same reaion they could not be taken from him by Mr. T." The doctor justifies his own conduct, and concludes with telling the world, he "thought it his duty to transmit them to his constituents." But if they were fent over to be communicated to a few confidential gentlemen only, inflead of being addressed to the speaker of the affembly, or one of the committee appointed to correfound with him, with orders to lay them before the house, how were they transmitted to his constituents? There is something mysterious in this business, which it is appreliended will not bear a discovery at present. It is suspected that the letters were procured out of some public office; and that Mr. Temple is not so perfeetly ignorant of all circumstances as the doctor's language feems

[Jan. 29, 1774.] The merits of the petition, presented some time ago by the doctor as agent for the Maffachufetts, praying for the removal of the governor, came on to be heard before the privy council. It is reported, that Mr. W-, wandering from the question before their lordships, poured forth such a torrent of virulent abuse on Dr. Franklin as scarce ever before took place in judicial proceedings. His reproaches appeared to fome present to be incompatible with the principles of law, truth, justice, propriety and humanity. And it was thought it would have redounded more to the honor of their lordships, had they seemed to enjoy less the lashes which the doctor underwent; and had they expressed their diffatisfaction by reducing the orator to the remembrance of the exalted characters before whom he uttered fuch language. The petition was difmissed, and the doctor is displaced from the office of deputy post-master general for the colonies. The philosopher may recollect in some future day the liberties taken with him before the privy council on the twentyninth of January, and take ample revenge on British ministers and courtiers.

[March 7.] A message from his majesty, on account of the late diffurbances in America, was prefented to both houses. Particular mention was made of the outrage committed by the people at Boffon. Matters are now brought to a crifis, and miniftry are bent upon vigorous, spirited measures. To prevent opposition from the merchants, the public papers were filled with writings on the subject, which painted the misconduct of the colonies in the strongest colours, and urged in particular the impoffibility of the future existence of any trade to America, if this flagrant outrage on commerce, as it is pronounced, went unpunished. These with other endeavours had the proposed effect. The resentment against the Americans became as high and as strong as could be desired, within the house: but the storm was to be directed against the Massack. The minister, in debate, stated that the opposition to the authority of parliament had always originated in that colony; and that that colony had always been instigated to such conduct, by the irregular and seditions proceedings of Boston. It was become necessary therefore to begin with that town. He had forgot, or would not mention, that the violent opposition to the stamp-act originated in Vir-

[Mar. 14.] Leave was given to bring in a bill " for the immediate removal of the officers concerned in the collection of the cultoms from Bolton, and to discontinue the landing and discharging, lading and fhipping of goods, wares and merchandifes, at Boston or within the harbour thereof. At the first introduction of the bill it was received with general applaufe. Mr. Bollan. however, petitioned to be heard for the Maffachusetts council, and in behalf of himself, and other inhabitants of Boston. The commons refused to admit his petition, though a few days back they had received one from him as agent for the council. The lords were actually hearing him on a petition, as a person duly qualified. On the third reading of the bill, another petition was presented in the name of several natives and inhabitants of North-America; which infifted flrongly on the injuffice of the act, and its tendency to alienate the affections of America; and expressly declared, that the attachment of America could not long furvive the justice of Great-Britain. The minority members maintained, that the bill flood fimply as a profeription of one of the greatest trading towns in the British dominions from the use of their port, and from all the commerce by which thousands obtained their bread. "Have we not (fay they) given an extent of power to his majefly to prevent the port of Boston from ever being reinflated, if the king should think proper? A fine is laid; the trade is prohibited until it is paid; and when the fine is paid, the town may be as far from recovering her trade as ever. The act provides, that the crown mult have fatisfaction, and that the laws of trade and revenue shall be obeyed. There is a sling in this. The act under pretence of an indemnity to the East-India Company, is meant to enforce the submillion to taxes. America will see this; and the cause of Boston will be made the cause of all the colonies. They are all as guilty as Boston. Not one has received the tea: fome have deffroyed it, others fent it back." But all opposition was inessectual; for the projected measures of government vernment were immutable. The bill paffed; and was carried up to the house of lords, where it was warmly debated, but, as in the house of commons, paffed without a division.

[March 31.] It receives the royal affent.

The Boston port-bill formed only one part of the coercive plan proposed by ministry. A bill was soon brought in for "the better regulating the government of the Massachusetts-bay." The purport of it was, to alter the constitution of the province, to take the whole executive power out of the hands of the democratic part, and to vest the nomination of counsellors, judges and magistrates of all kinds, including sheriffs, in the crown, and in some cases in the king's governor, and all to be removable at the pleasure of the crown.

In the debates it was asked of ministry, whether the colonies already regulated nearly in the manner proposed by the bill, were more submissive to the right of taxa ion than the Massachusetts. It was justly argued, the disorder lay much deeper than the forms of government; that the people throughout the continent were universally dissatisfied; and that the uneasiness and resistance was no less in the royal governments than in any other. Mr. Bellan again made an effort in favor of his province; but the commons resused to receive his petition. The ministry having carried the preceding bill, prepared another, without which, it was said,

[April 21.] Lord North presented the third bill " for the impartial administration of justice in the cases of persons questioned for any acts done by them in the execution of the law, or for the suppression of riots and tumults in the Massachusetts-bay." This bill provided, that in case any person was indicted in that province for murder, or any other capital offence, and it should appear to the governor that the fact was committed in the exercise or aid of magistracy, in suppressing tumults and riots, and that a fair trial could not be had in the province, he should fend the person so indicted, &c. to any other colony, or to Great-Britain to be tried. The charge on both fides was to be paid out of the The mincrity opposed this bill with great vehemence. They infifted that having no fort of reason for impeaching the tribunals of America, the real intention was to fet up a military government, and to provide a virtual indemnity for all the murders and capital outrages which might be committed by the barbarous hands of authority. From the impossibility of profecuting in Great Britain, they strenuously maintained that this was holding but encouragement for all kinds of lawiefs violence. Colonel Barre's speech upon the occasion o minanded the attention of the whole house, and closed admirably, with "You have changed your ground. You are becoming the aggressors, and offering the last of human outrages to the people of America, by subjecting them in effect, to military execution. Inflead of fending them the olive branch, you have fent the naked fword. By the olive branch, I mean a repeal of all the late laws, fruitless to you and oppressive to them. Ask their aid in a constitutional manner, and they will give it to the utmost of their ability. They never yet refused it, when properly required. Your journals bear the recorded acknowledgments of zeal with which they have contributed to the general necessities of the state. What madness is it that prompts you to attempt obtaining that by force, which you may more certainly procure by requifition. They may be flattered into any thing, but they are too much like yourselves to be driven. Have some indulgence for your own likeness; refpect their flurdy English virtue; retract your odious exertions of authority; and remember that the first step toward making them contribute to your wants, is to reconcile them to your govern-

The publications of the day quote an old member rarely in opposition, as having closed his speech with these remarkable words-" I will now take my leave of the whole plan. You will commence your ruin from this day. I am forry to fay, that not only the house has fallen into this error, but the people approve of the measure. The people, I am forry to fay it, are milled. But a short time will prove the evil tendency of this bill. If ever there was a nation running head long into ruin it is this." It is much quellioned by many whether the member did not mistake in faying-The people. The same natives of Amèrica, who petitioned against the Boston port-bill [May 2.] renewed their endeavours by a petition against these two bills. It was pointed with an uncommon energy and spirit; and strongly indicated the effects that these bills would produce in the place where they were intended to operate, It was admitted to lie on the table, and had no other notice taken of it.

Both bills were opposed in the house of lords, and the minority entered on each a very strong protest. On both however in each house, the number of the minority continued all along very low and inadequate, Mr. Bollan applied for a hearing in the house of lords upon the last bill, but was refused. He has stood up in desence of the rights and liberties of the Massachusetts when no other of the numerous advocates of the colonies, out of parliament, have appeared to check the torrent of the most grievous proteedings against them, in like manner, by their learning and fortitude.

Upon

Upon the first of the two bills, the protesting lords Richmond. Portland, Abingdon, King, Effingham, Ponfonby, Rockingham Abergavenny, Leinster, Craven and Fitzwilliam, differited among other reasons, "because definitive legal offence, by which a forfeiture of the charter is incurred, has not been clearly stated and fully proved neither has notice of this adverse proceeding been given to the parties affected; neither have they been heard in their own defence—because all the judges are to be nominated not by the crown, but by the governor; and all, except the judges of the fuperior court, are to be removable at his pleafure, and expressly without the consent of that very council, which is to be nominated by the king; the sheriff is made changeable by the governor and council, as often and for fuch purposes as they shall think, expedient, whereby the governor and council are intrusted with powers, with which the British constitution has not trusted his majefty and privy council, and have the means of returning fuch a jury in each particular cause, as may best suit with the gratification of their passions and interests, so that the lives and properties of the subject are put into their hands without control." The protesting lords took occasion to mention concerning the Boston port-act, " that, unexampled on the records of parliament, it had been entered on the journals of the house as voted, nemine diffentiente, and had been stated in the debate of the day, to have been fent to the colonies, as passed without a division in either house, and therefore as conveying the uncontroverted universal sense of the nation; and that an unfair advantage had been taken, on the final question for passing the penal bill, of the absence of those lords, who had debated it for feveral hours, and flrongly differted from it on the fecond reading, the period on which it is most usual to debate the principle of a bill.

On the fecond bill, the protesting lords Richmend, Fitzwilliam, Ponfonby, Rockingham, Portland, Craven, Leinster, and Manchester, differted among other reasons, "because the bill amounts to a declaration, that the house knows no means of retaining the colonies in due obedience, but by an army rendered independent of the ordinary course of law in the place where they are employed; because the bill seems to be one of the many experiments toward an introduction of essential innovations into the government of the empire." They said, "The authority given by this bill to compet the transportation from America to Great Britain, if any number of witnesses at the pleasure of the parties, prosecuting and prosecuted, without any regard to their age, sex, health, circumstances, business or duties, seems to us so extravagant in its principle, and so impracticable in its execution, as to confirm us further in our opinion of the spirit which animates the whole system of the present American regulations."

The fession was drawing near to the usual time of recess, and the greater number of the members were retired into the country. In this fituation a bill was brought into the house of lords, "For making more effectual provision for the government of the province of Quebec in North-America." It passed through that house with little if any observation. When it came down to the house of commons, it met with a very different reception. The principal objects of the bill were, to afcertain the limits of the province, which were extended far beyond what were fettled as fuch by the king's proclamation of 1763—to form a legislative council for all the affairs of the province, except taxation, which council was to be appointed by the crown, and the office to be held during pleafure, and his majesty's Canadian Roman Catholic subjects were to be entitled to a place in it—to establish the French laws and a trial without jury in civil cases, and the English laws, with trial by jury in criminal—and to fecure to the Roman Catholic Clergy, except the regulars, the legal enjoyment of their estates, and of their tythes from all who were of their own religion. The minority infifted, that the Protestant religion by this establishment enjoyed at best no more than a toleration. "The popish clergy," they faid, "have a legal parliamentary right to maintenance, the protestant clergy are left to the king's difcretion. Why are not both put at least on an equal footing, and a legal support provided for both?" The minority was uncommonly fmall; nevertheless, the bill produced much greater uneafiness and discontent out of doors, than any of those for punishing the old colonies. The present policy of it is, among other things, to gain, through the influence of the priests, the assistance of the laity in subjugating the other provinces.

[June 22.] It received the royal affent, when his majesty went to the house, at the close of the session; the business of which being ended, the ministry entertained the most sanguine expectations, that the submission throughout America would be immediate, and that complete obedience and tranquillity would be secured. The speech from the throne expressed similar sentiments. The triumphs and mutual congratulations of all who have supported the ministerial plan, within doors and without, are unusually great. These may be owing, not a little, to the affurances that governor Hutchinson has repeatedly given to many, that if the parliament would but act with resolution, and

By the Quebec act, the total revenue of the province is configned, in the first instance, to a warrant from the lord of the treafury, for the purpole of penfioning judges during pleafure. and the support of a civil list totally unlimited. The first lord of the treasury, without control of parliament, is therefore in actual possession of the revenues of one American province, under the authority of an act of parliament, with no other obligation expressed, than in general to defray the expences of the adminiflration of justice, and to support civil government. The refidue, as in the tea-act, is to be referved for the disposal of parliament. The government of Quebec is, in truth, a legal parliamentary despotism committed into the hands of the crown and its minister; for the crown of Great-Britain is constituted as absolute in the province, under an act of parliament, as any defpot that ever existed in the world. Hence is inferred what ministers would do through all America, did they possess the power.*

Your present governor, general Gage, has been appointed as the most proper person to see to the execution of the laws, which have been passed respecting both the colony and its capital: when he has fettled matters, and established order and due fubmission to the power of parliament, Mr. Hutchinson is to return and resume the chair. The last, fince his arrival, has been graciously received: his influence with ministry will continue, till events convince them that they have been greatly miliaken in relying upon his judgment on American subjects.-A commission during pleasure has passed the great seal, granting to general Gage full power and authority, where he shall fee cause, to pardon and remit all treasons, murders, felonies, crimes and misdemeanors whatsoever, and all fines or penalties what-

^{*} Mr. Hartley.

LETTER IX.

Roxbury, Sept. 28, 1774.

THE appointment of general Gage to the government was not thought of by Mr. Hutchinson. He expected to have been intrusted with the execution of the ministerial plan; and was rather disconcerted when he found it to be otherwise. Before he left the colony, he was presented with a few address; one by a number of gentlemen, conceived in very respectful terms, but against which many others entered a protest. Had he applied himself vigorously and sleadily, to the healing of the breach between the colonies and the parent state, instead of calling upon ministry to force submission, he would have been a blessing, and had the love of all; but now it will be well, if he does not prove a curse to both countries, and make himself odious to the latest posterity.

[May 13.] When general Gage landed on the long wharf, it was thought from appearances, that he had apprehensions of being ill-treated by the inhabitants; but though they were highly incenfed at the port-bill, which they had just received, they behaved toward him with the greatest decency. He was complimented by the council, the gentlemen in the commission of the peace, and others, and afterward sumptuously entertained.

The next day there was a numerous town-meeting to confider the port-bill; when they refolved, "That it is the opinion of this town, that if the other colonies come into a joint resolution to flop all importation from and exportation to Great-Britain; and every part of the Well-Indies, till the act be repealed, the fame will prove the falvation of North-America and her liberties; and that the impolicy, injustice, inhumanity and cruelty of the act, exceed all our powers of expression: We therefore leave it to the just censure of others, and appeal to God and the world." Copies of the act arrived in different parts; were multiplied with incredible expedition; and circulated through the colonies, by which the whole country was inflamed. In fome places they were printed upon mourning paper with a black border, and cried about the streets under the title of a barbarous, cruel, bloody and inhuman murder: in others, great bodies of the people were called together by advertisement, and the obnoxious law burned with great folemnity, fimilar to what was done in the time of the stamp-act.

When the Boston port-bill arrived at New-York, captains Sears and M'Dougall wrote to the committee at Boston, assuring them of the support of the New-Yorkers. The letter was Vol. I published without their names. The Yorkers would have fixed a censure upon them, but could get no proof of their being the writers. Captains Sears and M'Dougall called the people together by a publication. They collected, and after a violent opposition from the tories, who had brought their whole strength upon the occasion, a vote was obtained for appointing a committee on account of the port-bill, which was to confift of fifty-one. The tories fearing the worst, had provided a list; but all lists were taken off the table at Mr. Sears's motion, when nominations took place, and the number of whigs and tories was nearly equal. Mr. Sears got another added, which made the committee fifty-two. The whigs in it infifted that there must be a congress. The violence of Captain Sears's temper, and his influence over the populace, induced the tories to fall in with the proposal of one, rather than be exposed to the dangers of a mob; but they expected that they should prevent it. A letter was fent to the Boston committee, with a recommendation to them to appoint time and place. They approved of a congress, but de-clined making the appointments. The York committee considered the answer; and it was carried, to write to them asresh upon the subject. The tories were caught, for having agreed to the motion for a congress, they could not hinder it, by all their contrivances. You must admit of my using for brevity sake, the terms whig and tory for the pro's and con's on the subject of full redress to American grievances. When better can be met with, they shall be adopted: but they are universally applied in this manner by the liberty party.

The Boston committee of correspondence were sensible, that the utmost delicacy and precaution, in the use of words and expressions, were requisite in the present state of assairs; that so their enemies might not disappoint them of that support, for which they were to make a general application to all the colonists, and whom they addressed on the head of the port-bill, and the distresses coming upon the inhabitants, with the utmost respect: they were careful to insert in all their letters, "It is hoped that Boston will be considered as suffering in the common

While these letters were circulating, the period arrived for the meeting of a new general court, which assembled at Boston, [May 25.] when the services of the election-day were carried on as usual; but the hearts of many selt sad with the apprehension that it would be the last of the kind. Their forebodings were increased, by the number and characters of the elected counsellors whom governor Gage negatived, not less than thirteen. He laid nothing before the court more than the common business.

business of the province; but gave them notice of their removal to Salem on the first of June in pursuance of the act. Learning that the house of affembly, to evade removing, were hastening through the necessary business, with the greatest expedition, he adjourned the general court to the seventh of June, then to meet at Salem. Before that day, the inhabitants of feveral towns and cities, in different parts of the continent, concurred in expressing the greatest disapprobation of the measures pursued against Boston, an abhorrence of the new act, and a condemnation of the principles on which it was founded, with a refolution to oppose its effects in every manner, and to support their distressed brethren, who were to be the immediate victims. At Philadelphia a fubscription was fet on foot for the support of fuch poor inhabitants of Boston as should be deprived of the means of fubfiftence by the operation of the act. The Virginia house of burgesses appointed the first of June to be set apart as a day of fasting and humiliation, devoutly to implore the divine interpolition, for averting the heavy calamity which threatened destruction to their civil rights, and the evils of a civil war; and for giving one heart and one mind to the people, firmly to oppose every injury to the American rights. This occasioned their diffolution, but before they feparated eighty-nine of the members entered into an affociation, in which they declared, "That an attack made on one of our fifter colonies, to compel submission to arbitrary taxes, is an attack made on all British America, and threatens ruin to the rights of all, unless the united wisdom of the whole be applied." They recommended to the committee of correspondence, to communicate with the several committees of the other provinces, on the expediency of appointing deputies from the different colonies, to meet annually in general congress, to deliberate on those measures, which the united interests of America might from time to time require.

[June 1.] Business was finished at the custom-house in Bostom at twelve o'clock at noon, and the harbour shut up against all vessels bound thither; and after the fourteenth none were to be allowed to depart. The day was devoutly kept at Williamsburgh in Virginia, as a day of fasting and humiliation. There was a folemn pause in the business of Philadelphia. If we except the Quakers, near nine-tenths of the citizens shut up their houses; and the bells were rung mussed all the day. It was observed in other places as a day of mourning.

[June 7.] The Massachusetts general court met at Salem according to adjournment, and a committee was appointed to consider and report the state of the province. Mr. Samuel Adams observed, that some of the committee were for mild measures, which he judged no way fuited to the prefent emergency. He conferred with Mr. Warren of Plymouth upon the necessity of giving imo spirited measures, and then said, "Do you keep the committee in play, and I will go and make a caucus " against the evening; and do you meet me." Mr. S. Adams fecured a meeting of about five principal members of the house, at the time specified; and repeated his endeavours against the next night; and fo as to the third, when they were more than thirty: the friends of administration knew nothing of the matter. The popular leaders took the fenie of the members in a private way, and found that they should be able to carry their scheme by a fufficient majority. They had their whole plan compleated, prepared their refolves, and then determined upon bringing tho business forward. But before they went upon it, the door-keeper was ordered to let no one whatfoever in, and no one was to go out: however, when the bufiness opened, a ministerial member pleaded a call of nature, which is always regarded, and was allowed to go out. He then ran to give information of what was doing, and a mellenger was dispatched to general Gage. who lived at fome diffance. The fecretary was fent off to diffolve the general court; found the door fastened; knocked for entrance, but was answered, that the house was upon very important business, which when they had finished they would let him in. As he could obtain no entrance, he read the proclamation upon the fleps leading to the representatives' chamber, in the hearing of feveral members and others on the out-fide with him, and immediately after in the council, thus diffolving the geperal court. The house, while sitting with their doors thut, appointed Thomas Cuffing, Samuel Adams, Robert Treat Pain, James Bowdoin, and John Adams, elgrs. as their committee to

^{*} The word caucus, audits derivative cauculing, are often used in Boston. The last answers much to what we slile parliamenteering or electioneering. All my repeated applications to different gentlemen have not furnished me with a fatisfactory account of the origin of caucus. It feems to mean, a number of persons, whether more or less, met together to confult upon adopting and profecuting fome Icheme of policy, for carrying a tavorite point. The word is not of novel invention. More than fifty years ago, Mr Samuel Adams's father, and twenty others, one or two from the north end of the town, where all the ship business is carried on, nted to mee, make a canens, and lay their plan for introducing certain perious into places of trust and power. When they had settled it, they separated, and used each their particular influence within his own circle. He and his friends would furnish themselves with ballots, including the names of the parties fixed upon, which they distributed on the days of election. By acting in concert, together with a careful and extensive diflaibution of ballots, they generally carried the elections to their own mind. In like manner it was, that Mr. Lamuel Adams first became a representative for Boiton. meet meet other committees, that might be convened the first of September at Philadelphia, voted them five hundred pounds lawful (feventy-five pounds sterling each) and chose a treaturer. They recommended also to the several towns and districts, the raising the said sum, by equitable proportions, according to the last provincial tax—a recommendation which had all the force of a law. It was a triumph to many of the sons of liberty to think that the house had out-generalled the governor.

Sometime before the dilfolution of the general court, near upon three hundred citizens of Philadelphia met and appointed a committee to write to Boston. Their letter was temperate and firm. They acknowledged the difficulty of offering the inhabitants advice upon the fad occasion that existed; wished first to have the fense of the province in general; and observed that all lenient applications for obtaining redress should be tried, before recourse was had to extremities. They remarked that it might perhaps be right to take the fense of a general congress, before the desperate measure of putting an entire stop to commerce was adopted; and that it might be right at any rate, to referve that measure as the last resource when all other means had They mentioned, that if the making of restitution to the East India company for their teas would put an end to the unhappy controversy, and leave the people of Boston upon their ancient footing of conflitutional liberty, it could not admit of a moment's doubt what part they should take; but they added, it was not the value of the tea, it was the indefeafible right of giving and granting their own money, a right from which they could never recede, that was now the matter of confideration.

The importance and necessity of a general Congress was soon felt by every colony, so that the measure taken by the Massachusetts was gradually adopted by the others.

Maryland, whose zeal in the cause of liberty was ardent, had a meeting of the committees appointed by the several counties, at the city of Annapolis, who elected five deputies for that province, [June 25.] "to attend a general congress, at such time, and place as may be agreed on; to essect one general plan of conduct, operating on the commercial connection of the colonies with the mother country, for the relief of Boston and preservation of American liberty."

This meeting commenced three days before the election of deputies; and confidering the distance of Salem from Annapolis, cannot be ascribed to the transaction of the Massachusetts assembly on the seventeenth; beside, it appears from the words at such time and place as may be agreed on, that the committees did not know, that the Massachusetts assembly had mentioned the con-

When the opinion of the Boston town-meeting respecting a joint resolution of the colonies to stop all importation and exportation till the port-bill was repealed, arrived in South Carolina, it was represented to a number of the principal gentlemen in Charlestown. The mode proposed was thought to be of too much consequence to be adopted without the universal consent of the people. It was therefore determined to request a meeting of the inhabitants. That this might be as general as possible, circular letters were sent by express to every parish and district within the colony.

[July 6.] A great number from almost every part of South Carolina met at Charlestown. The proceedings of parliament against Boston and the Massachusetts-bay were distinctly related to this convention of the people; on which, without one diffenting voice, they came into various resolutions. Among others they refolved, " That five gentlemen be appointed deputies on the behalf of this colony, to meet the deputies of the feveral colonies in North America in general congress, to consider the act lately passed, and bills depending in parliament, with regard to the port of Boston and province of Massachusetts, also the grievances under which America labors, with full power and authority, in behalf of us and our constituents, to concert, and effectually to profecute, fuch legal measures (by which we for ourfelves and them most solemnly engage to abide) as in the opinion of the faid deputies, and of the deputies so to be affembled, shall be most likely to obtain a repeal of the faid acts, and a redress of these grievances."—That, while the oppressive act relative to Boston are enforced, we will cheerfully, from time to time, contribute toward the relief of fuch persons there, whose unfortunate circumstances may be thought to stand in need of most assistance:"-" That a committee of ninety-nine persons be now appointed, to act as a general committee, to correspond with the committees of the other colonies, and to do all matters and things necessary to carry the resolutions into execution; and that any twenty-one of them met together, may proceed on businesstheir power to continue till the next general meeting."

The appointment of the above mentioned deputies was recognized, ratified and confirmed by the house of assembly, at their next fession, on the second of August.

The Connecticut house of representatives, in expectation of the event during their recess, empowered a committee of nine, in case a congress of commissioners from the several colonies should be convened, to meet and choose delegates to serve for that colony, and to correspond with other committees. Mr. Silas Deane was of the committee, and being ambitious of going to congress, schemed their meeting at New London, (instead of Hartsord) where through the influence of a most worthy fatherin-law, his own policy, and his own vote, he obtained a majority of one, and became one of the four Connecticut delegates, though not viewed by those who know him most, as a person of the greatest integrity, or the truest patriotism.

At Philadelphia, a petition figned by near nine hundred free-holders was prefented to Mr. Penn, the governor, entreating him to call a general affembly as foon as possible. This request being refused, the province proceeded to the election of deputies, who foon after met at Philadelphia. The resolutions passed at this meeting, carry the marks of cool and temperate deliberation, as well as affection to the mother country, more than those of any others; and are at the same time equally firm in the

In them the deputies fet out with the strongest professions of duty and allegiance, and express their abhorrence of every idea of an unconflitutional independence on the parent state, and the most ardent wishes for a restoration of the former harmony. They reprobate in the strongest terms the act and bills relative to the Maffachusetts-bay, and declare that they consider their brethren at Boston, as suffering in the common cause. They insist upon the absolute necessity of a congress to consult together and form a general plan of conduct for all the colonies. They acknowledge, that a fuspension of the commerce of that large trading province with Great-Britain, will greatly distress multitudes of their industrious inhabitants, but pronounce themselves ready to offer that facrifice, and much greater, for the preservation of their liberties; however, they express their desire, that congress will first try the gentle mode of stating their grievances, and making a firm and decent claim of redrefs. They conclude with declaring, that that province will break off all commercial intercourse whatever, with any town, city or colony, and individuals in them, who shall refuse, or neglect to adopt and carry into execution, fuch general plan as shall be agreed upon in the congress.

They did not undertake to appoint the delegates, but left it to the Pennsylvania affembly, [July 22] who soon after fixed upon seven gentlemen.

At a meeting of delegates, from the different counties in Virginia, at Williamsburgh, beside the warmest professions of allegiance and loyalty, and several resolutions in common with the other colonies, they passed others, which, considering the circumstances of the colony, with its immediate dependence on the mother country for the disposal of its only staple commodity. must be considered as very deserving of attention, because strongly indicating the true spirit of that people. They resolved not to purchase any more flaves from Africa, the West-Indies, or any other place; that their non-importation agreement should take place on the first of the following November, and that if the American grievances were not redressed by the tenth of August 1775, they would export after that time, no tobacco, nor any other goods whatever to Great-Britain. They recommended the cultivation of fuch articles of husbandry, instead of tobacco, as might form a proper basis for manufactures of all forts; and particularly, the improvement of the breed of sheep, the multiplying of them, and the killing as few as possible. Aug. 5. They chose as delegates to general congress, Peyton Randolph, Richard Henry Lee, George Washington, Patrick Henry, Richard Bland, Benjamin Harrison, and Edmund Pendleton, efgrs.

At Newport, in Rhode-Island, an animating paper was circulated, with the motto JOIN OR DIE. The state of Boston was represented as a siege, and as a direct hostile invasion of all the colonies. "The generals of depotism (it says) are now drawing the lines of circumvallation around our bulwarks of liberty, and nothing but unity, resolution and perseverance, can save ourselves and posterity from what is worse than death—Slavery." The general assembly of the colony chose two deputies to represent the colony in a general congress; who were legally authorised for that service, [Aug. 10] under the hand and seal of the go-

All the other colonies, from New-Hampshire to South-Carolina inclusively, adopted the measure of electing representatives to meet in general congress.

To judge aright of the prefent alarming state of affairs, you must observe, that it does not arise from the discontent of a turbulent or oppressed nobility or gentry, so that by bringing over a few of the leaders, the rest will follow of course, or persist only to their own ruin; nor does it depend upon the resolution or perseverance of a body of merchants and dealers, so that every man, habitually studious of his immediate interest, will tremble at the thought of those consequences which may essentially affect it: nor will a few lucrative jobs or contracts split the colonists into numberless factions. On the contrary, the great force of the opposition consists in the landholders throughout America. The British lands in this continent, are, in general, and more especially in the New-England colonies, the Jersies, and in part of New-York and Pennsylvania, portioned out in such freeholds as afford that inediocrity of condition to the possessions, which is fushicient fufficient to raife strong bodies and vigorous minds; but seldom that superabundance which proves so fatal to both, in old and refined countries. The American freeholders, from many circumstances, are more enthusiastic lovers of liberty, than ever, were the English yeomanry. The body of them are too bold to be despifed without danger, and now that they are united too numerous to be bribed. Human nature being the fame in every quarter of the globe, had moderation instead of compulsion been employed, feveral who are at present zealous leaders, might have been fecured, and ministry (in colonies of fuch different manners, interests and principles, and on these accounts strongly inclined to variance with each other) might have carried many points which they will now find it difficult or impossible to do, fince they have united them, by evidencing a delign of subjugating each to a mode of government, to which all without exception are averse in the highest degree.

The Boston committee of correspondence received the most encouraging answers to their letters; and were assured that the town of Boston was considered as suffering in the common cause. They had more than the strongest expressions to console them, they had the substantial evidence of facts. Ministry promised themselves mighty advantages from making Salem the seat of government, with the privilege of an open port, while the neighbouring one, in itself of much greater consequence, was shut. But the merchants and freeholders of the town discovered a most noble spirit, which will prove a fore disappointment to them. It it was expected, that incurable envy, jealously and animosity, would be excited between the two towns, and that the refractory capital being abandoned and left alone to ruminate upon her forlorn situation, would soon be reclaimed and brought to a full sense of her duty; the very reverse will mortify.

[June 18.] The day after the diffolution of the general court, the inerchants and freeholders of Salem prefented an address to the governor, and in it expressed the most generous sentiments. They said, "We are most deeply assisted with a sense of our public calamities; but the miseries that are now rapidly hastening on our brethren in the capital of this province, greatly excite our commisseration, and we hope your excellency will use your endeavours to prevent a surface accumulation of evils, on that already forely disserted people."—"By shutting up the port of Boston, some imagine that the course of trade might be turned hither and to our benefit; but nature in the formation of our harbour, forbids our becoming rivals in commerce with that convenient mart. And were it otherwise, we must be dead to every idea of justice, and lost to all feelings of humanity, could we involve. I.

dulge one thought to feize on wealth, and raife our fortunes on the ruin of our fuffering neighbours." The governor was treated with the highest respect, and mention was made of their hoping much, from his general character, as well as from his wisdom and mildness in another command. They expressed the strongest attachment to the mother country, the deepest concern for the present unhappy troubles, and the most fervent wishes for a speedy and happy reconciliation, to obtain which they were willing to facrifice every thing compatible with the safety and dignity of British subjects.

Marblehead, a fea-port, about three miles from Salem, and equally far with the last from Boston, but a town of no great trade, being engaged chiefly in the cod-fishery, testified its regard and compassion for the capital, by letting the suffering merchants have the free use of its wharfs and stores. Its inhabitants offered also to attend the lading and unlading of their goods, and transact for them all the business to be done at their port, without putting

The pity and refentment of the country at large, were excited by observations published on the Boston port-bill. Those of Mr. Josiah Quincy, jun. were most generally read and admired. He observed-"The Boston port-bill condemns a whole town unheard, nay, uncited to answer; involves thousands in ruin and mifery, without fuggestion of any crime by them committed; and is fo conflituted, that enormous pains and penalties must ensue, notwithstanding the most perfect obedience to its injunctions. The destruction of the tea which took place without any illegal procedure of the town, is the only alledged ground of configning thousands of its inhabitants to ruin, milery and despair. Those charged with the most aggravated crimes, are not punishable, till arraigned before difinterested judges; heard in their own defence, and found guilty of the charge. But here a whole people are accused; prosecuted by they know not whom; tried they know not when; proved guilty they know not how; and fentenced to fuffer inevitable ruin. Their hard fate cannot be averted by the most fervile submission, the most implicit obedience to this statute. Their first intimation of it was on the tenth of May, and it took place the first of June, thence to continue in full force, till it shall sufficiently appear to his majesty, that full satisfaction hath been made by or in behalf of the inhabitants of Boston, to the East-India company, for the damage sustained by the destruction of their tea; and until it shall be certified to his majesty, by the governor or lieutenant-governor of the province, that reasonable fatisfaction has been made to the officers of the revenue and others, for the riots and infurrection mentioned in it. So short a space is given for staying the torrent of threatened evils, that the subject though exerting his utmost energy, must be overwhelmed, and driven to madness by terms of deliverance which deny relief

Others faid, "Had punishment been only threatened, had it been in our own option, whether we would lubmit or fuffer, the reason for complaint would have been less. But without previous warning in the propofal of any terms that might have prevented the coming of evil upon us, it is inflicted with ineffable vengeance; fo that should we servilely submit to all required, we must notwithstanding suffer almost total ruin." The conditions upon which alone our fufferings are to be removed, far from being fixed with precision, are so loose and indeterminate, that a governor may perpetuate them during his political existence, the king in council not being enabled to open the port without his certificate. The wharfs and landing places in Boston, which are the property of numerous individuals, are as to the use of them wherein only their value confifts, wrested out of their hands, and put into the king's, to be disposed of at his pleasure. Two wharfs indeed are to be opened again, when his majesty shall think proper; but the refidue are for ever interdicted the exercife of commerce."

The rough drafts of the bills "for the better regulating of the government of the Maffachufetts-bay;" and "for-the impartial administration of justice in it," as well as of that "for quartering the troops in America," upon their arrival at Boston, were instantly circulated through the continent, and filled up whatever was before wanting, of violence and indignation in most of the colonies. Even those who were moderate or seemed wavering, now became resolute and resentful. Nothing was to be heard of, but meetings and resolutions. Liberal contributions for the relief of the diffressed Bostonians were every where recommended, and soon practised. Numberless letters were written from diffricts, towns and provinces, to the people of Boston, in which, besides every expression of sympathy and tenderness, they were commended for their past conduct, and strongly exhorted to a perseverance in that virtue, which had brought on their sufferings. It was in vain, that the friends of government attended a town meeting, and attempted to pass resolutions for the payment of the tea, and for dissolving the committee of correspondence; they found themselves lost in a prodigious majority, and had no other resource than drawing up a protest against the proceedings of that body. The Boston committee of correspondence apprehended themselves so fixed in the good opinion of the public, that they ventured to frame and publish an agreement, entitled,

A solemn league and covenant.

June 29. General Gage was so alarmed at the idea of a folemn league and covenant, that he issued a strong proclamation against it, stiling it on unlawful, hostile, and traiterous combination. He charged all magistrates to apprehend and secure for trial, fuch as should have any share in aiding or abetting the foregoing or any fimilar covenant. The charge was needlefs; for the engagement was fo unguardedly expressed, and fo extremely infnaring, that it was feverely censured by many of the best and warmest sons of liberty, in and about Boston, who refused to give it support; so that, however it might be venerated out of the colony, it funk into obscurity at home; and changed its form into one that was less exceptionable, and yet equally well calculated to stop the trade with Great-Britain, and that accorded with those entered into about the same time, in various parts of the continent, without any previous concert with each other, any more than with Boston. The coincidence of fentiments and measures, given into by individuals, and assemblies larger and finalier, in the feveral and most distant colonies, without any previous contrivance, has been fo remarkable, that perfons, the furthest removed from superstition, have inclined to ascribe it to a fpecial providence of God. They have been feemingly actuated by one and the fame spirit, nearly at the same instant. letters have been dispatched from Boston to fellow-patriots afar, asking or giving advice; letters from these have been upon the road, giving or asking the very advice which was wanted—the like in other matters. Not that there is a uniformity in all points through the continent. The people may be divided into two great classes. One is for rushing headlong into the greatest extremities, without waiting till other measures are tried, or receiving the general fense of the colonies; and though eager for holding a congress: would leave it nothing to do, but to profecute the violences which they have began. The other is averse to violent measures, till all other means are ineffectually tried. They wish further applications to be made to Britain, and the grievances they complain of, with the rights which they claim, to be clearly stated and properly presented. This, they say, can be effectually done only by a general congress. There is a third party, who are friends to the British administration, or rather who do not totally disapprove of its measures; but their voice is so low, that except in a few particular places, it can fearcely be diffinguished. The friends to colonial rights have a great advantage over them, not only from the goodness of their cause, but their posfessing most of the presses on the continent. These are chiefly in the hands of the whigs, and news-papers publishing essays and other compositions, against the prevailing opinions of the people, have not a universal ipread, and cannot prove so profitable to the proprietors, as those on the other side of the question. The command, which the sons of liberty have of the press, gives them the superiority in point of influence, over their antagonists in the periodical publications of the day.

As the Botton port-bill prohibits all water-carriage, befide flutting up the port, the merchants are under the necessity of adopting the expensive mode of bringing their goods from Salem or Marblehead, all the way round, through Cambridge and Roxbury, to Boston: Had they been allowed to bring them to Charlestown by land, and thence to cross them over by water, they would have faved a fourth of the way. But it is pleafing to obferve what trade is going forward, notwithstanding the embarralfments with which it is clogged. Boston is exhibiting a scene of patience, fortitude and perfeverance, which will make them renowned in history. Though liberal contributions have been made, are raifing, and will be raifed, for the fuccour of fufferers; yet it may be eafily conceived, that in a town containing feveral thousand inhabitants, who have subsisted chiefly by commerce, and the various kinds of business subservient to it, and where the maintenance of many families depends merely upon the locality, the cutting off of that grand fource of their employment and subfishence, must occasion great distresses notwithstanding every relief. Even the rich are not exempt from the general calamity, as a very confiderable part of their property confifts in wharts, warehouses, stores, and those numerous erections, which are destined to the purposes of commerce, but are now no longer profitable.

The people at large have been for some time preparing to defend their rights with the point of the fword. They fee, that they are either to be terrified, or driven into submission, by an armed force; and are for providing against both. The countrymen, in returning from Boston, are daily bringing out guns, knaplacks, &c. Every one appears defirous of being well ac-They have arms in general, the militia law requiring it of all within a certain age. by a martial spirit, and are fired with an enthusiastic zeal for liberty. In most places, but particularly in Berkshire and Worcefler counties, where the influence of government was supposed to prevail most, nothing is to be seen or heard of, except the purchasing of arms and ammunition, the casting of balls, and the making of all those preparations, which testify the most immediate danger, and determined refistance. The high military tone of the country people, is to be placed chiefly to the account of the two bills "for regulating the government of the Massachusetts," and " the impartial administration of justice in it." These bills have proposed so thorough a change in the civil and religious liberties of towns and individuals, that they view themselves as intentionally deprived of every privilege, and reduced to the necessity of fighting for all they hold dear to them. It is of the utmost consequence that juries should not be packed. The accustomed mode of electing them is excellent, but liable to abuse, and there " may have been inflances wherein persons who have no regard to religion and to divine revelation, have been really picked up to ferve a turn  But this will not justify that most execrable alteration of leaving it in the power of the governor and council, through the aid of the sheriff, to obtain such a jury in each cause, as may best suit their passions and interests, whereby the lives and properties of

It is also to be enacted, by the regulating bill, that after the first of August 1774, there shall be no town-meetings, without the leave of the governor or lieutenant governor in writing, exprefling the special business of such meetings, first obtained, except the annual meetings in March for the choice of felectmen, constables and other officers; and in May for the election of representatives, and meetings to fill up the offices aforesaid on death or removal; and that no other matter shall be treated of at fuch meetings except the election of aforefaid officers or reprefentatives, nor at any other meeting except the business expressed in the leave given. tenth of the whole, have a right to proceed. They choose a prefident by the name of Moderator, who regulates the proceedings of the meeting. Each individual has an equal liberty of delivering his opinion, and is not liable to be filenced or browbeaten by a richer or greater townsman than himself. Every freeman or freeholder, as the business regards either the freeholders in particular or the freemen at large, gives his vote or not. and for or against as he pleases; and each vote weighs equally: whether that of the highest or lowest inhabitant. At these townmeetings the people are used to debate and conclude upon inflructions to their representatives respecting matters before, or likely to come before the general court-freely to express their fentiments regarding public transactions—to agree upon the choice of a minister, and the falary they shall give him; upon building or repairing the meeting-house, and upon a variety of other interesting matters, which concern the exercise of their civil or facred privileges. All the New-England towns are upon the same plan in general, though different in certain particulars. In the colony of Rhode Island, they have no minister paid by the town as a town, nor is it allowed by the government; the falary is not a town charge, but is made up out of the voluntary contributions of the denomination to which he is joined.

From the free exercise of all the above cited rights, the Massachusetts inhabitants are to be suspended by the aforesaid enacting clause. When they wish, or have occasion to hold meetings for any of the above purposes, they will be obliged to apply to the governor, who may put a negative upon every application, and who will have it in his power to prevent their settling a minister, when the pulpit is become vacant, till he can be well affured that the person on whom the choice will fall, either does or will incline to support governmental measures.

The bill for the impartial administration of justice the people consider as threatening them with military execution, if they comply not with that for the better regulating of the government. The English blood which they have derived from their forefathers, without corrupting it by foreign mixtures, for they have been too national to encourage, like some colonies, the settlement of foreigners among them—that blood boils in their veins at these two bills, and fires them to a military opposition. The inhabitants of Connecticut mean not, to be, idle spectators of the sate of their sister colony, which can only be a prelude to their own, and are therefore giving into equal exertions for stemming the approaching torrent.

Soon after general Gage's arrival, two regiments of foot, with a finall detachment of the artiflery and fome cannon, were landed at Boston, and encamped on the common. These troops were by degrees re-inforced by the arrival of feveral regiments from Ireland, New-York, Halifax, and at length from Quebec. The arrival and station of these troops, was far from being as greeable to the inhabitants; nor was the jealoufy in any degree less, in the minds of their neighbours of the furrounding counties. The diffatisfaction was increafed by placing a guard upon Boston neck, the narrow isthmus which joins the peninsula to the continent : for which measure the frequent desertion of the foldiers was the affigued reason. Individuals have encouraged fuch defertion; and the Boston committee have not failed to contribute to the temptation, by making the fituation of the foldiery, as disagreeable as they could, and by counterasting all endeavours to render it comfortable. The ast systematically for the prevention of all supplies for the British troops. Through their connection with the neighbouring committees, the farmers and others are prevented from felling them their straw, timber, slitwork, boards, in short every article excepting provisions necesfary for their subfishence. The straw which is purchased for their service is daily burnt. Vessels with brick, intended for the army, are funk; and carts with wood are overturned. Thus, by fome contrivance or other, purchases are either prevented, or when made, the king's property is destroyed in every manner in which it can be effected. While these things are doing, a trifling circumstance gives the inhabitants of Boston a full earnest of the support they may expect from the country in case of extremity, and an opportunity of knowing the general temper of the people. A report fpreads, that a regiment posted on the neck, has cut off all communication with the country, in order to flarve the town into a compliance with any measures which may be proposed to it. Upon this vague report, a large body of the inhabitants of Worcester county assemble, and dispatch two messengers express to Boston, to discover the truth of the information. These envoys acquaint the townsmen, that if the report had been true, there were feveral thousand armed men ready to have marched to their affiftance. They tell them further, that they are commissioned to acquaint them, that even though they should be disposed to a surrender of their liberties, the people of the country will not think themselves at all included in their act; that by the late act and the bills pending in the British parliament, when the last intelligence was received, their charter was utterly vacated; and that the compact between Britain and the colonies being thus diffolved, they are at full liberty to combine together, in what manner and form they think best, for mutual fecurity. August [August 4.] The governor, by a proclamation for the encouragement of piety and virtue, the prevention and punishment of vice, profaneness and immorality, has exasperated the minds of the people, owing to the infertion of hypocrify among the immoralities. They have been fcoffed at and reproached by enemies, and those of looser manners, for a pharifaical attention to outward forms and the appearances of religion; and the efore view this infertion as an intended infult. With the new acts, the governor received a lift of thirty-fix new counfellors, who agreeable to the new regulations, have been appointed by the crown, contrary to the method prescribed by the charter. About twenty-four of the gentlemen have accepted, fo that there is a sufficient number to attempt carrying on the business of government. But the courts of judicature at Boston are suspended, for the grand jurors refuse to take the oaths, and to act under new judges and laws. The petit jurors decline ferving, on account of Peter Oliver, esq; standing impeached by a late honorable house of commons of the province, and of the judges of the superior court being made to depend upon the crown. Not only fo, but the great and petty juries through the colony, unanimoully refuse to act in any manner under the new regulations; and the clerks of the court have found it necessary to acknowledge their contrition in the public papers, for iffuing the warrants by which the juries were fuminoned, and not only to declare that they will not act fo again, but to apologize for what they have done. At Great Barrington and fome other places, the people affembled in large bodies; and filled the court-house and avenues in fuch a manner, that neither judge nor officer could obtain entrance; and upon the sheriff's commanding them to make way for the court, they answered, "We know no court, nor any other establishment, independent of the ancient laws and usages of our country, and to none other will we submit, or give way upon any account."

At Salem the merchants, freeholders and other inhabitants, were by hand-bills fummoned to meet on Wednesday the twenty-fourth, to consider on measures for opposing the execution of divers late acts of parliament. The day preceding the intended meeting, [August 23.] the governor, who resides within a few miles of the place, published a proclamation prohibiting all perfons from attending. The proclamation being disregarded, a company of soldiers were ordered into town to disperse the meeting; but before they got to it, the business was finished, and the inhabitants withdrawn. Three of the gentlemen were apprehended, but gave bonds to appear in court, and so were dis-

The proceedings of the people and their manifest dispositions have alarmed the general, who has thought it necessary for the safety of the troops, as well as to secure the important post of Boston, to fortify the entrance at the neck, which affords the only communication, except by water, between the town and the continent. His own personal safety, while at his country residence in Danvers, would have been endangered, had not the prudence of Samuel Holten, esq; M. D. a genuine, determined, but considerate son of liberty, cooled and moderated the temper of his neighbours.

William Brattle, esq; frequently an elected counsellor under the charter, having given a hint to the governor to fecure the provincial ammunition, he fent two companies of foldiers across the river long before day break, [Sept. 1.] who possessed themfelves of the powder in the arfenal at Charlestown. circulated apace, and in the morning the inhabitants of the neighbouring towns, to the amount of several thousands, affembled at Cambridge, mostly in arms. They proceeded to the lieutenant governor Oliver's house, and to the houses of several of the new counfellors, and of others who they thought had shewn themfelves unfriendly to the province. Some of the counfellors were obliged to refign, and to declare they would no more act under, what are pronounced the arbitrary laws lately enacted. It was with difficulty that the multitude was restrained from marching to Boston, there to demand a delivery of the powder, and in case of resusal to attack the troops. This collection of people, and the confusion necessarily attending their transactions, gave rife to a rumour, that the fleet and troops were firing upon the town of Boston, which slew with amazing rapidity through New-England; and in less than 24 hours after, there were between 30 and 40,000 men in arms, some of whom marched from 20 to 30 miles toward Boston before they were undeceived. This report and the feizure of the powder, roufed the inhabitants in the other colonies beyond New-England, fo that they immediately began learning the military exercise. The transaction at Cambridge produced such other risings in the colony as obliged more of the new council to refign or to flee to Boston; whither, by the close of the month, the commissioners, the custom-house officers, and all who have made themselves particularly obnoxious, by taking an active and decided part against the country, repaired for protection. Thus is the feat of government at Salem abandoned, and the apparatus of a cuftom-house removed to a place, which an act of parliament has profcribed from all trade. About About this time the governor's company of cadets, confilling of Boston gentlemen, disbanded themselves, and returned him the standard he presented to them upon his arrival. This slight was owing to his taking away the commission from Mr. Hancock, who was colonel of the corps. But Mr. John Murray, a colonel of the militia, having accepted a seat in the new council, twenty-four officers of his regiment resigned their commissions in one day. Such is the prevailing spirit, that all persons accepting offices under the new laws, or preparing to act in conformity to them, are declared enemies to their country, and

The feizing of the powder, and the withholding from the legal proprietors what is lodged in the magazine of Boston, and the delign carrying into execution, of repairing and manning the fortifications at the entrance of the town, have occasioned the holding an affembly of delegates from the feveral towns and districts in the county of Suffolk, of which Boston is the county town. After a most spirited preamble, they resolved among other things, [Sept. 9.] "That no obedience is due from this province to either or any part of the late acts, but that they be rejected as the attempts of a wicked administration to enflave America:-That fo long as the justices are appointed or hold their places, by any other tenure than that which the charter and the laws of the province direct, they must be considered as unconstitutional officers, and as such no regard ought to be paid to them by the people of this country: -That if the justices shall fit and act during their prefent disqualified state, this county will bear harmless all sheriffs, jurors and other officers, who shall refuse to carry into execution the orders of said courts:—That it be recommended to the collectors of taxes and all other officers who have public monies in their hands, to retain the fame and not to make any payment thereof to the provincial county treafurer, until the civil government of the province is placed upon a conflitutional foundation, or it shall be otherwise ordered by the proposed provincial congress:-That the persons, who have accepted feats at the council board, by virtue of a mandamus from the king, have acted in a direct violation of the duty they owe to their country; this county do recommend it to all, who have so highly offended, and have not already refigned, to make public refignation on or before the 20th of this inflant September; all refufing fo to do, shall after faid day, be considered by this county as obstinate and incorrigible enemies to this country: -That the fortifications begun and now carrying on upon Bofton neck, gives us reason to apprehend some hostile intention against that town: - That the late act establishing the Roman Catholic religion in Quebec, is dangerous in an extreme degree to the Protestant religion, and to the civil rights and liberties of all America:—That whereas our enemies have flattered themselves. that they shall make an easy prey of this numerous brave people, from an apprehension that they are unacquainted with military discipline; we therefore, for the honor and fecurity of this county and province advise, that such persons be elected in each town as officers in the militia, as shall be judged of sufficient capacity, and who have evidenced themselves the inflexible friends to the rights of the people, and that the inhabitants do use their utmost diligence to acquaint themselves with the art of war, and do for that purpole appear under arms at least once every week: That during the present hostile appearances on the part of Britain, we are determined to act merely upon the defensive fo long as fuch conduct may be vindicated by reason and the principles of felf-prefervation, but no longer:-That as we understand it has been in contemplation to apprehend fundry perfons. of this county, we do recommend, flould fuch measure be put in practice, to feize and keep every fervant of the prefent government throughout the province, until the perfons fo apprehended be restored uninjured:-That we recommend to all persons, not to engage in any routes, riots, or licentious attacks upon the properties of any person whatsoever, as being subversive of all order and government; but by a fleady, manly, uniform, and persevering opposition to convince our enemies, that in a contest so important, in a cause so solemn, our conduct shall be fuch as to merit the approbation of the wife, and the admiration of the brave and free of every age and of every country." They then drew up an address to the governor, and voted that Doctor Joseph Warren (a phyfician, an amiable gentleman, who wifhes for a reconciliation between the colonies and the parent state, upon a redrefs of grievances, and aims not at independency) with others, be a committee to wait on his excellency, to inform him how the county is alarmed, and to remonstrate against the fortifications making on the neck, and the repeated infults offered by the foldiery, to perfons passing and repassing into Boston, and to confer with him on those subjects. The governor was waited upon to know if he would receive the committee with the address; but desiring a private copy of it, that when he received them, he might be ready with a prepared answer, he was furnished with it, and afterward fixed on Monday the 12th for. receiving the committee. The doings of the county delegates, and a copy of the address to the governor have been sent off by express to the general congress now met at Philadelphia. On the Monday, when the committee had delivered the address of the county, he answered to it, "I have no intention to prevent the free egress and regress of any person to and from the town of Boston. I shall suffer none under my command to injure the person or property of any of his majesty's subjects; but it is my duty to preserve the peace, and to prevent surprise; and no use will be made of the cannon, unless the hostile proceedings of the people shall render it necessary." The patriots are waiting earnestly for the opinion of congress on the Sussolk resolves, in hopes that they will be approved of; and if so, they will go on with greater resolution and courage; for they will consider such approbation as a declaration, that the colony will be supported by congress, in case hostilities are necessary for the preservation of its liberties, and is also justissable in arming and training the militia.

Mr. Quincy is upon the point of failing for Britain, at the request of several co-patriots. Be so obliging as to pay a proper attention to him: you will be pleased at finding him so intelligent a gentleman, and may rely upon his information. Shall keep the letter open, that if the sense of congress is received time enough,

P. S. The fons of liberty are in high spirits. The Suffolk refolves were before congress on Saturday morning, the 17th, and were confidered; after which it was refolved unanimoufly, "That this affembly deeply feels the fuffering of their countrymen in the Maffachufetts-bay, under the operation of the late unjust, cruel and oppressive acts of the British parliament:—That they most thoroughly approve the wifdom and fortitude with which opposition to these wicked ministerial measures has hitherto been conducted, and they earnestly recommend to their brethren, a perfeverance in the same firm and temperate conduct as expressed in the refolutions determined upon, at a meeting of the delegates for the county of Suffolk, on Tuesday the 6th instant, (that was the day of their first meeting, but they did not finish till the 9th) trufting that the effect of the united efforts of North-America in their behalt, will carry such conviction to the British nation of the unwife, unjust, and ruinous policy of the present administration, as quickly to introduce better men and wifer measures: -" Refolved unanimoufly, That contributions from all the colonies for supplying the necessities, and alleviating the diffresses of our brethren at Bofton, ought to be continued, in fuch manner, and so long as their occasions may require," Mr. Quincy fails to-day.

LETTER X.

Roxbury, February 3, 1775.

THE measures pursued by the British ministry, for subjecting America to parliamentary authority in all cases whatever, have united the twelve colonies, from New Hampshire to South Carolina inclusively, into a compact body. Many on the fide of government flattered themselves, that the event would never exist. They had no small ground for it, considering that several of the colonies clash in their particular interests; have been frequently quarrelling about boundaries and other matters; differ greatly in manners, customs, religion and constitutions; and have local prejudices, jealousies and aversions. But they have been pressed by a common danger, threatening the most valuable rights of each individual province, fo that they have all elected delegates to meet in a general congress to consult in what way to obtain a redrefs of grievances, and ward off the impending ru-The ministerial influence in New-York has not prevailed as was expected, to keep that colony from joining the others. Great dependence was had upon their monied men; but the cause of liberty was too popular, and the numbers that espoused it too many and too independent, either to be bribed or overawed.

Sept. 5. The delegates being arrived at Philadelphia, from all the colonies except North-Carolina, they met in general congress, and proceeded to the choice of a president, when Peyton Randolph, esq; was unanimously elected, and Mr. Charles Thomfon was unanimously chosen fecretary. They resolved, that " in determining questions, each colony shall have one vote." Before they engaged in any special business, the North Carolina delegates joined them. The number of the whole when together, is fifty-two, befide the prefident. The first important service wherein they engaged, you have had an account of in the preceding postscript. In their subsequent resolutions [Oct. 8.] they declared. "That if the late acts of parliament shall be attempted to be carried into execution by force, in fuch case all America ought to support the inhabitants of the Massachusetts-hay in their oppofition:-That if it be found absolutely necessary to remove the people of Boston into the country, all America ought to contribute toward recompending them for the injury they may thereby fustain:-And that every person, who thall accept, or act under any commission or authority derived from the act of parliament, changing changing the form of government and violating the charter, ought to be held in deteffation." They have written a letter to general Gage, [Oct. 10.] in which they express the deepest concern at his proceeding in a manner that bore fo hostile an appearance, and which even the oppressive acts of parliament did not warrant. They represent the tendency this conduct must have to irritate and force the people, hitherto well disposed to peaceable measures, into hostilities, which may prevent the endeavours of congress to restore a good understanding with the parent state, and may involve us in the horrors of a civil war. They express their hope, that the general, to quiet the minds of the people, will discontinue the fortifications in and about Boston, prevent any further invalions of private property, restrain the irregularities of the foldiers, and give orders that the communication between the town and country may be open, unmolested and free.

The general in his answer faid, "No troops have given less cause for complaint, and greater care was never taken to prevent it; and fuch care and attention was never more necessary from. the infults and provocations daily given to both officers and foldiers. The communication between the town and country has been always free and unmolested, and is so still." This affertion may appear perfectly just to a military gentleman; but may be otherwise thought of by one in a civil department, who means that the entrance into a town should have neither guards nor sentinels, either to stop or challenge passengers, whether by night or by day. The general intimated, that the hostile preparations throughout the country, and the menaces of blood and flaughter made it his duty to fortify the neck. He concluded with-" I ardently wish, that the common enemies to both countries may fee, to their disappointment, that these disputes between the mother country and the colonies, have terminated like the quarrels of lovers, and increased the affection which they ought to bear to each other."

The congress have also made a declaration of rights (contained within a number of resolves) to which, they say, the English colonies of North-America are entitled by the immutable laws of nature, the principles of the English constitution, and their several charters or compacts. In the first of these are life, liberty and property, a right to the disposal of any of which, without their consent, they have never ceded to any sovereign power whatever. They mention, that their ancestors, at the time of their emigration, were entitled to all the rights, liberties and immunities of free and natural born subjects, within the realm of England; and that by such emigration they by no means forseited, surrendered or lost any of those rights; but that they were, and their descendants now are, entitled to the enjoyment of all such of them, as their local and other circumstances enabled them to exercise. They then state, that the foundation of English liberty, and of all free government, is a right in the people to participate in their legislative council; and proceed to show, that as the colonists are not, and from various causes, cannot be represented in the British parliament, they are entitled to a free and exclusive power of legislation in their several provincial legislatures, where their right of representation can alone be preserved, in all cases of taxation and internal policy, subject only to the negative of their sovereign, in such manner as had heretofore been used.

To qualify the extent of this paragraph, which may feem to leave no means of parliamentary interference, for holding the colonies to the mother country, they declare, that, from the necessity of the case, and a regard to the mutual interests of both countries, they cheerfully consent to the operation of such acts of the British parliament as are, bona fide, restrained to the regulation of their external commerce, for the purpose of securing the commercial advantages of the whole empire to the mother country, excluding every idea of taxation, either internal or external, for raising a revenue on the subjects in America without

They resolved, "That the respective colonies are entitled to the common law of England, and more especially to the great and estimable privilege of being tried by their peers of the vicinage; to the benefit of such of the English statutes as existed in the time of their colonization, and which they have found to be applicable to their feveral and other local circumstances; and to all the immunities and privileges granted and confirmed to them by royal charters, or secured by their several codes of provincial laws:-That, they have a right to affemble peaceably, confider of their grievances, and petition the king; and that all profecutions, prohibitory proclamations, and commitments for the fame, are illegal:-That the keeping a standing army in these colonies, in times of peace, without the confent of the legislature of that colony in which such army is kept, is against law: - That it is rendered effential to good government, by the English constitution, that the constituent branches of the legislature be independent of each other; that therefore the exercise of legislative power, by a council appointed, during pleasure, by the crown, is unconstitutional and destructive to the freedom of American legislation."

They proceeded to claim, in behalf of themselves and constituents, and to insist on the foregoing articles as their indisputa-

ble rights and liberties, which cannot be legally taken from them, altered or abridged by any power whatever, without their own confent by their representatives in their several provincial legislatures. They then resolved concerning eleven acts of parliament, or parts of acts, passed in the present reign, that "they are infringements and violations of the foregoing rights, and that the repeal of them is effentially necessary, in order to restore harmony between Great-Britain and the American colonies." Among these is the Quebec bill, which is termed "an act for establishing the Roman catholic religion in the province of Quebec, abolishing the equitable system of English laws, and erecting a tyranny there, to the great danger (from so total a dissimilarity of religion, law and government) of the neighbouring British colonies, by the affishance of whose blood and treasure the said country was conquered from France."

After specifying their rights and enumerating their grievances, they mention, that in hopes of being restored to that state, in which both countries formerly found happiness and prosperity, they have for the present, only resolved to pursue the following peaceable measures, viz. to enter into a non-importation, non-consumption, and non-exportation agreement; and to prepare an address to the people of Great-Britain, a memorial to the inhabitants of British America, and a loyal address to his ma-

By the affociation they have bound themselves, and intentionally their constituents, to a strict observance of fourteen articles. They have agreed by the fecond, that after the first of December next, they will wholly difcontinue the flave trade, and will neither hire their veffels, nor fell their commodities to those who are concerned in it :- By the third, That from that day, they will not purchase or use any tea imported on account of the East-India company, or any on which a duty hath been or shall be paid; and from and after the first of March next, they will not purchase or use any East-India tea whatever, nor any of those goods. they have agreed not to import, which they shall have cause to fuspect were imported after the first of December, except such as come under the directions afterward mentioned :- By the fourth, That the non-exportation agreement shall be suspended to the tenth of September, 1775, after which, if the acls objected to are not repealed, they will not directly or indirectly export any commodity whatfoever to Great-Britain, Ireland or the West-Indies, except rice to Europe .- By the fifth, That they will never more have any commercial intercourse with any British merchants, who may ship goods in violation of and with a view of breaking the affociation :- By the eighth, That they will encou-· Vol. I. rage frugality, economy and industry, promote agriculture, arts and manufactures, discourage every species of extravagance and diffipation, and will wear no other mourning than a piece of crape or ribbon: -By the fourteenth and last, That they will have no trade, dealings or intercourfe whatfoever, with any North-American colony or province, that shall not accede to, or that fhall hereafter violate the affociation; but will hold them as inimical to their country. This affociation, which is to continue in force, till the above acts, or parts of acts, wherein they relate to the colonies, are repealed, has been figned [Oct. 24.] by all the members of congress.

In their address to the people of Great-Britain, the congress pay the highest praise to the noble and generous virtues of their and our common ancestors; but in a way which rather reproaches you with a shameful degeneracy. They tell you not to be furprifed, that they, who are descended from the same common ancestors, should refuse to surrender their liberties and the constitution you so justly boast of, to men, who found their claims on no principles of reason, and who prosecute them with a design, that by having our lives and property in their power, they may with the greater facility enflave you. They complain of being oppressed, abused and misrepresented, so that it is become a duty to themselves and their posterity, and to the general welfare of the British empire, to address you on this very important subject. They call upon you yourfelves, to witness to their loyalty and attachments to the common interest of the whole empire; to their efforts in the last war; and to your own acknowledgment of their zeal, and your even reimburfing them large fums of money, which you confessed they had advanced beyond their proportion, and far beyond their abilities. They proceed to flate and examine the measures and the several acts of parliament, which they confider as hostile to America; and represent the probable confequences to your country should ministry be able to carry the point of taxation, and reduce the colonies to a state of perfect flavery. They ingeniously endeavour to render theirs a cause common to both countries, by flowing, that fuch fuccess might in the end, be as fatal to the liberties of Britain as to those of America. "Take care (fay they) that you do not fall into the pit preparing for us." After denying the feveral charges of being feditious, impatient of government, and defirous of independency, which they affert to be calumnies; they declare, that if neither the voice of justice, the dictates of the law, the principles of the constitution, nor the suggestions of humanity, can reflrain your hands from fledding of human blood in such an impious cause; they must tell you, "That they never will submit to

to be hewers of wood, or drawers of water for any ministry or nation in the world." They afterward make a propofal, which, if duly attended to, may afford a favorable basis for negociation -" Place us in the fame fituation that we were in at the close of the last war, and our former harmony will be restored." The fame truth was transmitted to some of the ministry by the late reverend Mr. Whitefield, before his death in 1770, at Newburyport, in nearly the following words, "Would you have peace and harmony restored through the colonies, you must attend to the military phrase, right about as you were." The like sentiment was confirmed by a fubsequent letter, from another quarter, after a defigned conference upon the subject with Thomas Cushing and Samuel Adams, elgrs. of Boston, and Thomas Lynch, efg; of South-Carolina. The congress conclude their address, by expressing the utmost regret at their being compelled by the over-ruling principles of felf-preservation, to adopt measures detrimental to numbers of their fellow subjects in Great-Britain and Ireland, in the suspension of their importations from both these kingdoms. They finally rest their hope of a restoration of that harmony, friendship and fraternal affection between all the inhabitants of his majesty's kingdoms and territories, so ardently wished for by every true and honest American, upon the magnanimity and justice of the British nation, in furnishing a parliament of fuch wifdom, independence and public spirit, as may fave the violated rights of the whole empire, from the devices of wicked ministers and evil counsellors, whether in or out of office.

Congress, in their memorial to the inhabitants of British America, inform the colonies, that they have diligently, deliberately and calmly inquired into all the measures, which have excited the present disturbances; and that upon the whole they find themfelves reduced to the difagreeable alternative of being filent, or betraying the innocent, or of speaking out and censuring those they wish to revere. They prefer the course dictated by honesty, and a regard for the welfare of their country. After flating and examining the feveral laws which have been paffed, and the measures which have been pursued with respect to America, since the conclusion of the late war to the present period, they inquire into the motives for the particular hostility against the town of Boston and province of Massachusetts-bay; though the behaviour of the people in other colonies, has been in equal opposition to the power affumed by parliament; notwithstanding which no step had been taken against any of them by government. they reprefent as an artful fystematic line of conduct, concealing feveral defigns, adding, "It is expected that the province of the Maffachusetts-bay will be irritated into some violent action, that may displease the rest of the continent, or that may induce the people of Great-Britain to approve the meditated vengeance of an imprudent and exasperated ministry. If the unexampled pacific temper of that province shall disappoint this part of the plan, it is hoped the other colonies will be so far inimidated as to defert their brethren, fuffering in a common cause, and that thus. difunited all may be fubdued." They proceed to flate the importance of the trust, which has been reposed in them, and the manner in which they have discharged it; and deeply deplore the necessity which pressed them to an immediate interruption of commerce, and apologize with faying, "We are driven by the hands of violence into unexperienced and unexpected public convulsions, and are contending for freedom so often contended. for by our ancestors." "The people of England," fay they, "will foon have an opportunity of declaring their fentiments concerning our cause. In their piety, generosity and good sense, we repose high confidence, and cannot upon a review of past events. be perfuaded, that they, the defenders of true religion, and the affectors of the rights of mankind, will take part against their affectionate protestant brethren in the colonies, in favor of our open and their own fecret enemies, whose intrigues for feveral years pall have been wholly exercifed in fapping the foundations of civil and religious liberty." Toward the close they have these words, "We think ourselves bound in duty to observe to you, that the schemes agitated against these colonies have been so conducted as to render it prudent that you should extend your views to the most unhappy events, and be in all respects prepared. for every contingency.'

The address of congress to his majesty is clothed in the habit of an humble petition, wherein they beg leave to lay their grievances before the throne. After an enumeration of them, they implore his elemency for projection against them; and imputeall their diffretles, dangers and fears, to the deflructive fyftem of colony administration, adopted since the conclusion of the last war. They express their apprehension, that as his majesty enjoys the fignal diffinction of reigning over freemen, the language of freemen cannot be displeasing; adding, "Your royal indignation, we hope, will rather fall on those designing and dangerous men, who daringly interpofing themselves between your royal person and your faithful subjects, and for several years past inceffantly employed to diffolve the bonds of fociety, by abufing your majefty's authority, mifreprefenting your American fubjects. and profecuting the most desperate and irritating projects of oppreflion, have at length compelled us, by the force of accumulated injuries, too fevere to be any longer tolerable, to disturb your majesty's repose by our complaints." They beg leave to affure his majesty, that in regard to defraying the charge of the administration of justice and the support of civil government, fuch provision has been and will be made, as has been and shall be judged, by the legislatures of the several colonies, just and suitable to their respective circumstances; and that for the defence, protection and fecurity of the colonies, their militias, if properly regulated as they earnestly desire may be immediately done, would be sufficient, at least in times of peace; and in case of war his faithful colonists will be ready and willing, as they ever have been when constitutionally required, to demonstrate their loyalty, by exerting their most strenuous efforts in granting supplies and raifing forces. They fay, "We ask but for peace, liberty and fafety. We wish not a diminution of the prerogative, nor do we folicit the grant of any new right in our favor. Your royal authority over us, and our connection with Great-Britain, we fhall always carefully and zealoufly endeavour to support and maintain."—" We present this petition only to obtain redress of grievances and relief from fears and jealousies, occasioned by the fystem of statutes and regulations adopted since the close of the late war, by the abolition of which fystem, the harmony between Great-Britain and these colonies, will be immediately reflored. In the magnanimity and justice of your majesty and parliament we confide for a redrefs of our other grievances, trusting, that when the causes of our apprehensions are removed, our future conduct will prove us not unworthy of the regard, we have been accustomed in our happier days to enjoy. For, appealing to that Being who fearches thoroughly the hearts of his creatures, we folemnly profels, that our councils have been influenced by no other motive, than a dread of impending destruction." They implore his majesty in the most solemn manner, as the loving father of his people, connected by the fame bands of law, loyalty faith and blood, not to fuffer the transcendent relation formed by these ties to be further violated, in uncertain expectation of effects, that if attained, never can compensate for the calamities through which they must be gained. They most earneffly befeech him, that his royal authority and interpolition may be used for their relief; and that a gracious answer may be given to their petition. The close is a prayer, that his majesty may enjoy every felicity through a long and glorious reign, and that his descendants may inherit his prosperity and dominions till time shall be no more.

The congress, a week after resolving upon the association, an address to the people of Great-Britain, a memorial to the inhabitants of the colonies, and an address to his majesty, further refolved, "That an address be prepared to the people of Quebec, and letters to the colonies of St. John's, Nova-Scotia, Georgia, East and West Florida, who have not deputies to represent them.

Their address to the French inhabitants in Canada, discovers. the most dexterous management, and the most able method of application to the temper and passions of the parties, whom they endeavour to gain. They fate the right they had, upon becoming English subjects, to the inestimable benefits of the English constitution; and that this right was further confirmed by the royal proclamation in 1763, plighting the public faith for their full enjoyment of those advantages. They impute to succeeding ministers an audacious and cruel abuse of the royal authority, in withholding from them the fruition of the irrevocable rights, to which they were thus juffly entitled. They undertake to explain to them, some of the most important branches of that form of. government from which they are debarred; and in fo doing, quote passages from their countryman Montesquieu, whom they artfully adopt as a judge and an irrefragable authority upon this They then proceed to specify and explain, under feveral distinct heads, the principal rights to which the people are entitled by the English constitution; and these rights they truly fay, defend the poor from the rich, the weak from the powerful, the industrious from the rapacious, the peaceable from the violent, the tenants from the lords, and all from their fuperiors.

They attempt pointing out numberless deformities in the Quebec bill, and placing them in those points of view which should! render it odious to mankind. They renew their applications to the passions and partiality of the Canadians; and at length introduce Montesquieu as addressing them thus: "Seize the opportunity presented to you by Providence itself. You are a small people compared with those who with open arms invite you into a-fellowship. A moment's reflection should convince you, which will be most for your interest and happiness, to have all the rest of North-America your unalterable friends, or your inveterate enemies. Your province is the only link wanting to complete the bright and strong chain of union. Nature has joined your country to theirs. Do you join your political in-The value and extent of the advantages tendered to you are immense. Heaven grant you may not discover them to bebleffings after they have bid you an eternal adieu." They endeavour to obviate the jealousies and prejudices which might arise, from the difference of their religious principles, by instancing the case of the Swiss Cantons, whose union is composed of Roman Catholic and Protestant states, living in the utmost concord and peace with one another, and thereby enabled to defy and defeat every tyrant that has invaded them. The congress, upon this article, appear to have winked out of fight their complaint about establishing the Roman Catholic religion in Quebec, and to expect that it would be unknown to the Canadians, or give They declare, that they do not ask them to them no umbrage. commence hostilities against the government of their common sovereign, but only invite them to confult their own glory and welfare, and to unite with them in one focial compact. conclude by informing them, that the congress had, with univerfal pleafure, and an unanimous vote, refolved, That they should consider the violation of their rights, by the act for aitering the government of their province, as a violation of their own; and that they should be invited to accede to their confederation.

Before this address was persected and signed, congress resolved, [Oct. 21.] "That the seizing, or attempting to seize any person in America, in order to transport such person beyond the sea, for trial of offences committed in America, being against law, will justify and ought to meet with resistance and reprisal." They have also agreed, that another congress shall be held on the tenth day of May next, unless the redress of grievances be obtained before that time.

The general congress, having finished their deliberations, disfolved themselves [Oct. 26.] The impartial world will go near to acknowledge, that the petitions and addresses from the congress have been executed with uncommon energy, skill, and ability; and that abstractedly confidered, in respect to vigor of mind, strength of fentiment, and patriotic language, they would not difgrace any affembly whatfoever. The studied attention that congress have paid to the Massachusetts-bay and its distressed capital, will both console and invigorate the inhabitants. Many, however, of the congressional acts were neither carried unanimously, nor without much debate. Mr. Galloway of Pennfylvania, and Mr. Duane of New-York, inclined to the fide of ministry. The former became a member at the earnest folicitation of the affembly, and refused compliance till they had given him instructions agreeable to his own mind, as the rule of his conduct. These instructions they suffered him to draw up: they were briefly to flate the rights and the grievances of America, and to propose a plan of amicable accommodation of the differences between Great-Britain and the colonies, and of a perpetual union. September the twenty-eighth a plan was proposed by him, which was debated a whole day, when the question was carried fix colonies to five, that it should be refumed and further considered: but it at length fell through. The ten resolutions which the congress came to in their declaration, expressing their indubitable rights and liberties, met with very confiderable onposition. Mr. Duane and others who drew with him, perplexed the proposals made by the high fons of liberty, so that the congress did not come to a single resolution for more than a fortnight, neither in stating their rights nor their grievances.-When fix days before that declaration, on October the eighth. the resolution was passed, "That the Congress approve the opposition of the inhabitants of the Massachusetts-bay to the execution of the late acts; and if the same shall be attempted, &c."-Galloway and Duane not only opposed, but wanted to have their protests entered; which being refused, on their return from congress they gave each other a certificate, declaring their oppofition to that question, as they thought it a treasonable one #.-In some stage of their proceedings, the danger of a rupture with Britain was urged as a plea for certain concessions. Upon this Mr. S. Adams rofe up, and among other things faid in fubstance, "I should advise persisting in our struggle for liberty, though it was revealed from heaven that 990 were to perish, and only one of a thousand to survive and retain his liberty. One such freeman must possess more virtue, and enjoy more happiness than a thousand slaves; and let him propagate his like, and transmit to them what he hath fo nobly preserved." It was a flight of patriotism, ferving to show the temper of the speaker: but the fentiment is so hyperbolical, as to throw it far beyond the reach of practice. Mr. S. Adams having feen an happy iffue to the important deliberations of the general congress, after his return repaired to the Massachusetts provincial congress to aid in their

General Gage, by the advice of his new council, iffued writs for the holding of a general affembly at Salem on the 5th of October. The events which afterward took place made him think it expedient to counteract the writs, by a proclamation for sufpending the meeting of the members returned. But the legality of the proclamation was called into question; and the new members, to the number of 90, met according to the precepts, on the day and at the place appointed. Having waited that day, [Oct. 5.] without the presence of the governor, or any substitute for him, to administer the oaths and open the session; on the next day they appointed a committee to consider the proclamation; and on the third, resolved themselves into a provincial congress, to be joined by such others as have been or shall be chosen, to take into consideration the dangerous and alarming fituation of public affairs. The following day they met in provincial congress and adjourned to Concord, about 20 miles from Charlestown, and when there chose Mr. Hancock president. -They proceeded to appoint a committee to wait upon the governor with a remonstrance, in which they apologize for their meeting, from the diffressed state of the colony; express the grievous apprehensions of the people; affert that the rigor of the Boston port-bill is exceeded by the manner in which it is carried into execution; and complain of the late laws and the hostile preparations on Boston neck. They conclude with adjuring him, to defift immediately from the construction of the fortress at the entrance into Boston, and to restore that pass to its natural state. The governor was involved in some difficulty as to giving them an answer, for he could not acknowledge the legality of their affembly. Necessity however prevailed. He expressed great indignation at the idea's being formed, that the lives, liberties, or property of any people, except avowed enemies, could be in danger from English troops; and observed, that notwithstanding the enmity shown to the troops, by withholding from them almost every thing necessary for their preservation, they had not yet discovered the resentment which might justly have been expected to arise from such hostile treatment. He reminded them. that while they complained of alterations made in their charter by acts of parliament, they were themselves by their present asfembling, fubverting that charter, and now acting in direct violation of their own constitution: he therefore warned them of the rocks they were upon, and to defift from fuch illegal and unconflitutional proceedings. But they were not in the least diverted from profecuting their measures. They adjourned to and met at Cambridge, [Oct. 17.]

[Oct. 21.] A committee was appointed to draw up a plan for the immediate defence of the province. It was concluded to raife and inlift a number of minute-men, now for the first time so called, from their being to turn out with their arms at a minute's warning. Upon the debate for raising money to purchase military articles, a thousand pounds lawful, (a fourth less than sterling) was moved for and seconded; then two thousand. The country members in common had no conception of the expences attending warlike operations; and were dreadfully asraid of voting away their own and their constituents money, however necessary the expenditure of it. They are generally persons of good understanding in matters within their own sphere, but are not competent judges of those that lie without it: and being accustomed only to small sums, startle at the mention of those. which to them have the comparative appearance of enormoufly large: and yet it is needful to humour their want of scientific knowledge, to prevent difgust and obtain their support. Of this the more intelligent members of the affembly were fensible.-Therefore the debate was closed by appointing a committee to give in an estimate of the articles wanted, together with their cost; this being done, the committee of fafety were empowered to affemble the militia, when they shall judge the same neceffary for the defence of the inhabitants of the province; and the committee of supplies to purchase ammunition, ordnance, flores, &c. not exceeding the value of 20,8371. lawful, or 15,627l. 15s. sterling—a glorious furn with which to oppose the power and riches of Great-Britain! The committee of fafety. and the committee of supplies, consist of different persons, and are intended for different purposes. The first, beside being empowered to affemble the militia, are invested with other authority for the fafety of the province, and are to recommend to the committee of supplies the purchasing of such articles as may be deemed necessary. The last are to affish the committee of safety not only by purchasing supplies, but by affording them help for executing the measures, which may be thought by them requisite for the public benefit. Both are to fit and to continue to do bufiness, when there is a recess of the provincial congress, as also when none existeth. It is resolved, Oct. 25. That all matters shall be kept private; but in such a numerous affembly it is next to impossible to effect it. Were all equally true to the same cause, each will not have the like power of retaining a fecret.

[October 27.] The honorable Jedediah Pribble, the honorable Artemas Ward, and colonel Pomeroy, all of whom have feen fome fervice in the last war, were elected general officers to have the command of the minute-men and militia, in case they should be called out to action.

October 29- The provincial congress adjourned to November 23.

As winter approached, the governor ordered temporary barracks to be erected for the troops. But fuch was the diflike to their being provided for in any manner, that the felect men and committees obliged the workmen of the town to quit their employment, for fear of subjecting themselves to the resentments of their countrymen. The governor had as little success in endeavouring to procure carpenters from New-York; so that it has been with the greatest difficulty that he has gotten those temporary lodgments erected. He has endeavoured also to procure some winter covering from that city; but the merchants have refused complying with any part of the order, and returned for answer, "They never will supply any article for the benefit of men, who are sent as enemies to their country." The general had thoughts at one time of creeting a fort upon Beacon-hill.—The Boston committee obtained the plan of it, waited upon him, and informed him, that they heard he had such a design, and that if he proceeded to execute it, he would get himself into difficulties. He would not own that he had any such intention, but attempted rather to make them believe the contrary; on which they produced the plan, and told him it was the same that was presented to him the night before.

On the other hand, the Mallachusetts committee of safety were not inattentive to their duty. They recommended to the committee of supplies [Nov. 2, 8, 14, 20.] the procuring of pork, flour, rice, and peas, and the depositing of the same partly at Worcester and partly at Concord. They further advised the procuring of all arms and ammunition that could be got from the neighbouring provinces; and of spades, pickaxes, bill-nooks, iron shovels and pots, mess bowls, cannon, ball, &c. &c.

Every thing now served to increase the mutual apprehension and animosity between the government and the people. Those of Boston professed to be under no small terror, from an apprehension of danger to their property, liberties and lives. The soldiers on the other hand, considered themselves in the midst of enemies. Each side made profession of the best intentions in the world for its own part, and showed the greatest suspicion of the other. In this state of doubt and profession, matters were made still worse by a measure, which seems not of sufficient importance in its consequences to justify its having been hazarded at so critical a season. This was the landing of a detachment of sailors by night from the ships of war in the harboer, who spiked up all the cannon upon one of the batteries belonging to the town.

In the mean time, through the disposition and promptitude of the people, the resolutions and recommendations of the provincial congress, had all the weight and efficacy of laws. At length the governor was induced to iffue a proclamation, [Nov. 10.] in which they were charged with proceedings, generally understood as nearly tantamount to treason and rebellion. The inhabitants were accordingly prohibited in the king's name, from complying, in any degree, with the requisitions, recommendations, directions, or resolves of that unlawful assembly.

the feelings of many in congress. Through timidity they began to sicken at heart, and upon the plea of sickness begged leave to return home, and were indulged. Mr. S. Adams penetrated the cause of their complaint; and, in order to stop the epidemical distemper, expressed his great willingness, that when members were not well, they should be allowed to return, but proposed that they should be enjoined, upon getting back, to inform the towns that they were no longer represented, that so others might be sent to supply their absence. The proposal soon cured the malady; for the disorder chose to remain in congress rather than incur the displeasure of their constituents, and be supplanted by new successors.

The provincial congress resolved upon getting in readiness 12,000 men to act upon any emergency; and directed that a quarter of the militia should be inlisted as minute-men, who were allowed the liberty of choosing their own officers, and were to receive pay. They fent persons to New-Hampshire, Rhode-Island and Connecticut, to acquaint them with what was doing, and to request that they would prepare their respective quotas to make up an army of 20,000 men when wanted. Upon this a number of gentlemen were fent from these colonies to confult and fettle with a committee of about twenty, chosen by the congress for the purpose. There was a difficulty about fixing what should be the precise period for opposing general Gage's troops; at length it was determined, that they should be opposed whenever they marched out with their baggage, ammunition and arrillery; for this would carry in it an apparent intention of acting hostilely in support of British measures.

[Dec. 6.] A committee was appointed to correspond with the inhabitants of Canada; and it was resolved, that the following letter be addressed to the several ministers of the gospel within

" REV. SIR,

WE cannot but acknowledge the goodness of heaven, in conflantly supplying us with preachers of the gospel, whose concern has been the temporal and spiritual happiness of this people.—
In a day like this, when all the friends of civil and religious liberty are exerting themselves to deliver this country from its present calamities, we cannot but place great hopes in an order of men, who have ever dislinguished themselves in, their country's cause, and do therefore recommend to the ministers of the gospel, in the several towns and other places in this colony, that they assist us in avoiding that dreadful slavery with which we are now threatened."

The ministers of New-England being mostly congregationally, are from that circumstance, in a professional way more attached and habituated to the principles of liberty than if they had spiritual fuperiors to lord it over them, and were in hopes of pollefling in their turn, through the gift of government, the feat of power. They oppose arbitrary rule in civil concerns from the love of freedom, as well as from a defire of guarding against its introduction into religious matters. The patriots for years back have availed themselves greatly of their assistance. Two sermons have been preached annually for a length of time, the one on general election day, the last Wednesday in May, when the new general court have been used to meet according to charter, and elect the counsellors for the enfuing year: the other some little while after, on the artillery election-day, when the officers are re-elected, or new officers are chosen. On these occasions political subjects are deemed very proper; but it is expected that they be treated in a decent, ferious and instructive manner. The general election preacher has been chosen alternately, by the council and the house of affembly. The fermon is stilled the election sermon, and is printed. Every representative has a copy for himfelf, and generally one or more for the minister or ministers of his town. As the patriots have prevailed, the preachers of each fermon have been the zealous friends of liberty; and the passages most adapted to promote and spread the love of it, have been felected and circulated far and wide by means of newspapers, and read with avidity and a degree of veneration, on account of the preacher and his election to the fervice of the day. Commendations both public and private, have not been wanting to help on the defign. Thus by their labors in the pulpit, and by furnishing the prints with occasional essays, the ministers have forwarded and strengthened, and that not a little, the opposition to the exercise of that parliamentary claim of right to bind the colonies in all cases whatever.

The clergy of this colony are as virtuous, fensible and learned a fet of men, as will probably be found in any part of the globe of equal fize, and equally populous. The first fettlers were early attentive to the providing of suitable persons to fill their pulpits with dignity. They saw the importance of it, and in 1636 the general court gave some hundred pounds toward a public school at Newton; but Mr. John Harvard, a worthy minister of Charlestown, dying in 1638, and bequeathing between seven and eight hundred pounds to the same use, the school took the name of Harvard college by an order of court, and the town upon the occasion changed its name for that of Cambridge.—This college has been encouraged ever since, and is the first upon the continent. It is the alma mater to whom the youth of this colony, in particular, are fent, whether defigned for the pulpit, the bar, or other callings. Here they receive the rudiments of those qualifications by which they are enabled to serve their country in a civil or facred department. The falaries of the ministers are moderate, but in general sufficient for their support by the aid of good economy. They cannot approve of often bringing politics into the pulpit, yet they apprehend it to be right upon special occasions. Who but must admit, that " it is certainly the duty of the clergy to accommodate their discourses to the times; to preach against such sins as are most prevalent, and to recommend fuch virtues as are most wanted. For example, if exorbitant ambition and venality are predominant, ought they not to warn their hearers against the vices? If public spiritis much wanted, should they not inculcate this great virtue? If the rights and duties of magistrates and subjects are disputed, should they not explain them, show their nature, ends, limitations and restrictions?" You have frequently remarked, that though the partizans of arbitrary power will freely censure that preacher, who fpeaks boldly for the liberties of the people, they, will admire as an excellent divine, the parfon whose discourse is wholly in the opposite strain, and teaches, that magistrates have a divine right for doing wrong, and are to be implicitly obeyed; men professing christianity, as if the religion of the bleffed Jesus bound them tamely to part with their natural and focial rights, and flavishly to bow their neck to any tyrant; as if Paul was faulty in standing up for his Roman privileges, that he might escape a scourging, or falling a facrifice to the malice of his countrymen, when he a pealed unto Cæfar.

[Dec. 8.] The provincial congress chose colonel Thomas and colonel Heath, additional generals, and foon after diffolved themfelves, that they might be at home in time to keep thankfgiving with their families. It has been long a custon in the colony to have a fast day in the spring, and a thanksgiving late in the fall of the year, or in the beginning of winter, when the heads of families collect their children around them; and beside attending the religious exercises of the day, feast upon a plentiful though not a fplendid table, and are innocently merry. The observation of this day they call "a keeping thank fgiving." The appointment of both days belongs in an orderly way to the governor; but in these extraordinary times the provincial congress appointed the public thankfgiving, on which among other enumerated bleffings, a particular acknowledgment was to be made to the Almighty for the union which so remarkably prevails in all

The affembly of Pennsylvania met toward the close of the year, and were the first legal body of representatives, that ratified unanimously all the acts of the general congress, and appointed delegates to represent them in the new congress to be held the enfuing May. It is thought, that they were in a great measure dragged into it, from the fear of a provincial convention.

No fooner did they receive at Rhode-Island, the account of the royal proclamation, prohibiting the exportation of military stores from Britain, but the people seized upon and removed from the batteries about the harbour, above forty cannon of different sizes. The affembly also passed resolutions for procuring arms and military stores, by every mean, and from every quarter in which they could be obtained, as well as for training and arming the inhabitants.

When copies of these resolutions and of the proclamation arrived at Portsmouth, in New-Hampshire, the people of the province were spirited up to make their first hostile movement. Though governor Wentworth's influence could not prevent their appointing deputies, holding a convention at Exeter, and choofing delegates for the continental congress; yet he had the address to moderate their tempers, and to keep them from acts of violence. But the example of their neighbours, and the alarming fituation of affairs, at length roused them to uncommon exertions. [Dec. 14.] More than four hundred men collected and befet his majesty's castle at Portsmouth. Captain Cochran who commanded, ordered three four-pounders to be fired on them, and then the small arms; before he could be ready to fire again, the fort was flormed on all quarters, and the affailants immediately fecured both him and his men, and kept them prisoners about an hour and a half, during which they broke open the powder-house, took all the powder away, except one barrel, and having put it in boats and fent it off, released him from his confinement.

The hardy inhabitants of Marblehead, used to all the toils and dangers of a seafaring life, being out of employ, have attended to military exercise for hours, three days in a week, and will soon constitute a fine regiment of soldiers. The gentlemen of the place have encouraged them by their own example, and made it profitable to them. Something similar has been practised at Salem, and other towns. The militia of the colony will, therefore, acquire some knowledge of arms, before they are called to engage in actual service, should that unhappily be the iffue of present measures.

shown what may be expected from them; for though they refolved to bear the most faithful allegiance to his majesty, they declared that the love of liberty and attachment to the real interests and just rights of America, outweighed every other consideration, and that they would exert every power within them for the defence of American liberty, when regularly called forth by the unanimous voice of their countrymen.

Barnstable, in New-England, and Ridgefield, in Connecticut. have diffinguished themselves in adopting different measures from the other towns in their respective colonies. But the New-York representatives have given the greatest disgust. After the assembly's taking into confideration the regulations agreed upon at the grand congress respecting commerce, they rejected the same. This however was thought to be compensated for, by the late refolution of the Pennfylvania convention, [Jan. 23, 1775.] wherein they have declared, "That, if the petition of the continental congress should be difregarded, and the British administration should determine by force to effect a submission to the late arbitrary acts of the British parliament: in such a situation, we hold it our indispensable duty to result such force, and at every hazard to defend the rights and liberties of America." The convention likewise recommended in particular the making of salt, gunpowder, falt-petre and steel. Among the many sons of liberty of which they were composed, Mr. Charles Thomson was eminent for inflexible spirit; but Mr. Thomas Mifflin was as the very foul of the capital and province. Such are his natural and acquired accomplishments, his unwearied exertions, his zeal, his address, his sprightliness, that he enlightens and invigorates every thing around him.

The inhabitants of Maryland were no less zealous on the prefent critical occasion, than those of the most active provinces. They were all in motion, forming county meetings, entering into affociations, choosing committees, and recommending meafures for carrying the resolutions of the continental congress into effectual execution. The convention has appointed a sum of money for the purchase of arms and ammunition. Every person, who results to contribute to the purchase, is deemed an enemy to his country. Many of the principal gentlemen are ambitious of appearing in arms to defend its liberties. They have taken the power of the militia out of the hands of the governor, and established it by their own authority, for the desence of the Massachusetts as well as of themselves; and thus have shown, to all the world, their approbation of New-England measures. The lower counties of the Delaware have acted in like manner.

[Jan. 27.] The New-Hampshire affembly, in answer to a letter from Maryland, has gone further than ever before, in saying, "You may depend upon the ready concurrence of this house with the measures thought necessary to be pursued by the other colonies in the great cause of liberty."

But the province did not trust to the complexion of the affembly. A convention of deputies was appointed by the several towns, and held at Exeter, when the proceedings of the continental congress were unanimously approved; and members chosen to represent them at the ensuing one, two days before the affembly gave their answer.

Most of the New-Yorkers accommodate themselves to the meafures appointed by the general congress.

The general committee in Charleslown, South-Carolina, upon receiving an account of these measures, immediately convened a provincial congress; and procured a return of representatives from every parish and district in the colony, by which mean the body consisted of more than two hundred, while the constitutional affembly amounts to no more than forty-nine. The increase of the representatives naturally served the cause of the country, by engaging a greater number of leaders in support of it. This first provincial congress met on the eleventh of January, they have unanimously approved the proceedings of the general congress, and resolved to carry them into execution. Committees of inspection and observation have also been appointed, whose business it is to see that the public resolutions are universally obeyed, that so they may not be broken, through the selfishness of individuals. This is the prevailing mode of guarding against such selfishness in every colony.

From the former fuccess of non-importation agreements, and a belief that the trade of America is indispensably necessary to Britain, it is generally hoped and expected in the fouthern flates, that the obnoxious acts will be repealed. They have no idea of an appeal to the sword, notwithstanding all the military parade that exists. A bloodless felf-denying opposition is the whole of their real intention, and all the facrifice that they imagine will be required. Similar sentiments prevail among great numbers in the Massachusetts; who while they are preparing for war, expect that present appearances will never terminate in it; for that Great-Britain will not fight with her best customers, but will relax and accommodate, when they find the Americans resolutely

Perfons, who discover great anxiety about the continuance of trade, are confidered as selfish, preferring private interest to the good of the country; and under this thought, the intemperate Vol. I. O o zeal of the populace in some places, transports them beyond the limits of moderation, to apply singular punishments to individuals who counteract the general fense of the community.

There is however to appearance, an amazing agreement through the continent; and it may be imagined, that the inhabitants of the twelve colonies have but one heart, and but one understanding. Affemblies, conventions, congresses, towns, cities, private clubs and circles, are feemingly animated by one great, wife, active and noble fpirit-one mafferly foul, enlivening one vigorous body. All their acts tend to the fame point, the supporting of the measures of the continental congress. But be assured, there are great numbers in every colony, who disapprove of these measures—a few comparatively, from principle and a persuasion that the same are wrong, and that they ought to submit to the mother country-fome through attachment to the late governmental authority exercised among them-many from self-interest but the bulk for fear of the mischievous consequences likely to follow. The professing friends of liberty have acted in a spirited manner, while the others have lain fill. Such as have difcovered a disposition to oppose popular measures have not been fupported, and therefore have declined making further efforts, and abfented themselves from town and other meetings. The popular cry being against them, they have fought personal peace and fafety in remaining quiet. But could the truth be afcertained, it would probably be discovered, that in most of the town and other meetings, even in New-England, far more than half the parties having a right to attend, from various causes were absent; and that there were a great many among the abfentees, who were such, because they knew that matters would be carried at such meetings contrary to their own fentiments. Not only fo but it may be reasonably supposed, and time may prove that several in affemblies, conventions and congresses, voted against their own opinion, to fecure themselves from refentment and to promote their present interest.

An inclination has appeared in feveral of the governmental gentlemen now in Boston, to attempt opening the court at Worcester, and to support it by the aid of two regiments. It has been the subject of conversation. When the proposal of marching them came to be considered in council, it was laid aside. The governor was well pleased with the determination; he certainly does not wish to bring on a rupture.

Now let me conclude with giving you a picture of the Massa-chusetts colony, which you will be inclined to pronounce on uncommon and assonishing curiosity. Some hundred thousand people are in a state of nature, and yet as still and peaceable, at present, as ever they were when government was in full vigor. We have neither legislators, nor magistrates, nor executive officers. We have no officers, but military ones; of these we have a multitude chosen by the people, and exercising them with more authority and spirit, than ever any did who had commissions from a governor. The inhabitants are determined never to submit to the act destroying their charter, and are every where devoting themselves to arms. To force upon them a form of government to which they are absolutely averse, may not be within the omnipotence of a British parliament. The attempt has produced a suspension of all legal authority, and yet individuals enjoy the same security as before, even when they differ from the public sentiment, have they the prudence to moderate their tempers and observe a neutrality. By accommodating themselves so far to the times, they are safe at home and abroad.

The fortitude with which the town of Boston supports its prefent distresses, and the determination it discovers to endure as much as human nature can, rather than betray the American cause and endanger the liberties of posterity, will secure it the encomiums of future generations. Not a town or city in all the colonies would have been likely to have exhibited so glorious a spectacle, had it been called out to a similar trial; and all the friends of American liberty through the continent may congratulate themselves, that the storm of ministerial vengeance has fallen first upon the capital of the Massachusetts, as in consequence of it they have enjoyed the opportunity of providing against the worst that may be attempted, in order to reduce them to subjection.

LETŢER XI.

London, March 3, 1775.

A Strange supineness prevailed, for some time after my last was closed, among the great body of the English nation; and the colony contests were little regarded. Numbers slattered themselves, that as things had formerly so often appeared at the verge of a rupture, without actually arriving at it, some means would be found for accommodating the present dispute. The opinion opinion also was circulated, that a continuance of resolution perfished in, would certainly put an end to the contest, which (it was faid) had been nourified wholly by former concessions; people in general were therefore inclined to trust the trial of perfeverance and resolution, to a ministry who valued themselves upon these qualities. The times have been highly favorable to any purpose, which only required the concurrence of the parliament and the acquiescence of the public. Administration has taken advantage of these circumstances, [Sept. 30, 1774,] and the late parliament has been diffolved, a twelve month before the expected time. This may be meant as a preparatory step to the most coercive measures with America; but in a new house of commons ministry will be left at large, to choose or alter their line of conduct as incidents may vary, and if necessary, can throw all the odium of the late laws upon the former parliament.

[Nov. 30.] His majesty in his speech informed the new one, that a most daring spirit of disobedience to the law still unhappily prevailed in the Massachusetts, and had broken forth in fresh violences of a criminal nature; that these proceedings had been encouraged in other colonies, and unwarrantable attempts been made to obstruct the commerce of the kingdom, by unlawful combinations; that fuch measures had been taken, and fuch orders given, as were judged most proper for carrying the laws into execution; and that they might depend upon a firm resolution to withfrand every attempt to weaken the supreme authority of the legislature over all the dominions of the crown, his majesty being affured of receiving their support while acting upon these principles.

The proposed address in the house of commons, produced a confiderable debate; and the minister was reminded of the mighty effects he had predicted from the late acts against America; -They were to humble that whole continent in the duft, without further trouble, and the punishment of Boston was to strike an universal panic on all the colonies; that refractory town would be totally abandoned, and inflead of obtaining relief, a dread of the fame fate would even prevent the appearances of pity. But the address was carried without any amendment, by a majority of more than three to one.

That from the house of lords was couched in strong terms, and was warmly debated. It was rendered memorable by a protest, thought to be the first upon an address, and which was very pointed; it concluded with the following remarkable declaration: "But whatever may be the mischievous designs, or the inconfiderate temerity, which leads others to this delperate courfe we wish to be known as persons, who have disapproved of mea-HALL , fures fo injurious in their past effects and their future tendency. and who are not in hafte, without inquiry or information, to commit ourselves in declarations which may precipitate our country into all the calamities of a civil war.*" The address was carried by a majority of 63 to 13.

Notwithstanding the hostile tone of the speech, and the great majority that supported the addresses, there appeared an irresolution on the fide of ministry; and previous to the Christmas recess they feemed evidently to shrink from all contest upon American fubjects. The national estimates were entirely formed upon a peace establishment; and the minister of the naval department publicly afferted in the house of lords, that he knew it would be fully fufficient for reducing the colonies to obedience. spoke with the greatest contempt both of the power and courage of the Americans; and held that they were not disciplined, nor capable of discipline, and that formed of such materials, and fo indisposed to action, the numbers, of which such boasts had been made, would only add to the facility of their defeat.

The establishment will indeed, be fully sufficient, if the miniflry mean to employ the navy only, and to recal the military.-Ships may effect that with little hazard and expence, which if once attempted by foldiers, may plunge the nation into enormous disbursements, and yet not be accomplished. A few ships of the line stationed singly near the capital ports of the colonies, and a number of frigates employed as cruifers to ftop the Americans from fending any velfels to fea; and this measure continued, would at length weary out the inhabitants of the towns and cities upon the fea-coast of the continent, and induce one or other of them to fubmit; and if but one link of the chain gave way, the whole would foon come to the ground; and were the fea-ports once brought to adjust the present dispute with administration, the towns in the back country might be gradually inclined to the fame, whatever may be their prefent apprehensions. The proper application of the navy to the American contest would also exclude all foreign interference.

The congressional proceedings were received before the Christmas recess, and ministry were disposed to retract their violent measures and to redress American grievances. To this end, application was made, under the auspices of the minister, to the body of the American merchants, defiring them to frame petitions for the redress of American grievances, and the restoration of American rights, and promising compliance with them, as it was most agreeable to the ministry to repeal the obnoxious acts, feemingly in consequence of petitions at home. While this was in agitation, letters were received from New-York, affuring that the assembly would reject the proceedings of the general congress, and that there would be a separation of that colony from the rest. Fresh hopes were conceived from the prospect of a division, upon which ministry reverted to measures more adapted to their own inclination *.

But during the recess, persons began to consider the consequences which might follow the congressional proceedings, and a general alarm was spread. This produced several meetings of the North-American merchants in London and Bristol; and petitions to parliament were prepared and agreed upon in both places. But the times were so altered from what they were formerly, that no mercantile opposition could prove efficacious by endangering the continuance of the ministry.

On the first day of the meeting after the recess, the nobleman at the head of the American affairs, laid the papers belonging to his department, before the lords, on which Lord Chatham rose, and expressed his utmost dissent and disapprobation of the whole fystem of American measures.

Being in possession at present of your friend Mr. Quincy's journal, wherein he gives a particular account of his lordship's speech, of the copies of several letters sent by himself to America, and of other matters, permit me to transcribe from the same, and give you the thoughts and expressions of Mr. Quincy, with the dates.

[Nov. 11, 1774.] Viewed Plymouth docks. My ideas of the riches and powers of this great nation are increased to a degree I should not have believed, if it had been predicted to me. I am not in any measure reconciled to the British plan of taxing America, but I should with cheerfulness accede to a contribution from the colonies, (they being the sole judges of the time and quantity of their grants) toward the charges of the British government.

[Nov. 18.] This morning J. Williams eq; informed me, that governor Hutchinson had repeatedly assured the ministry, that a union of the colonies was utterly impracticable; that the people were greatly divided among themselves in every colony; and that there could be no doubt but that all America would submit; that they must, and would soon. Several of the nobility and ministry assured Dr. Franklin of the same sacts.

[Nov. 19.] Lord N—— repeatedly faid to me, "We must try what we can do to support the authority we have claimed over America; if we are defective in power, we must sit down contented and make the best terms we can; and nobody then can blame us after we have done our utmost; but till we have tried what we can do, we can never be justified in receding; and we ought to, and shall be very careful not to judge a thing impossible, because it may be difficult; nay, we ought to try what we can effect before we can determine upon its impracticability."

[Nov. 24.] To——. "The following language hath been reiterated to me in various companies"—"We are afraid of nothing but your division, and your want of perseverance.—Unite and persevere; you must prevail—you must triumph."

"From parliament expect no favour, but what proceeds from fear. Depend not upon commercial plans for your fafety.—Dr. Franklin is an American in heart and foul. His ideas are not contracted within the narrow limits of exemption from taxes, but are extended upon the broad scale of total emancipation.—He is explicit and bold upon the subject."

[Nov. 26.] Governor P——— affured me, that all the meafures against America were planned and pushed on by Bernard and Hutchinson. They were incessant in their applications to administration, and gave the most positive affurances of success.

[Dec. 6.] Mr. commissioner M—— waited on me. In the course of conversation he said, "You can have no idea of the taxes of this kingdom, and the distress of our poor. They are extreme poor and wretched indeed—every thing here is taxed to the utmost. The colonies must relieve us: they must ease us of our taxes, &c." He also affirmed to me, that governors Bernard and Hutchinson were principally attended to in the late measures against the colonies. But he added, that government had found many things had turned out different from Hutchinson's representation, and had not been at all conformable to what he foretold.

To ———. "My whole time is employed in endeavouring to ferve my country. I find every body eager to hear, most people willing to be set right, and almost all grossly ignorant of the American world. It is agreed on all hands, that your courage—your courage, I repeat it—will be brought to the test.—Should it prove answerable to your oftentations, and worthy of your ancestors, your friends will amazingly increase, your hearty friends will be in raptures. Prepare, prepare I say, for the worst."

" Many of your friends here in both houses will not take a decisive part till they see how you act in America. For should they take a determined part now in favour of that country, and in a fhort time America give back, their hopes of rife into power er and office (which are the hopes of all British statesmen) would be for ever at an end. Therefore till the colonists discover that union and spirit, which all parties here agree, must force success, you are not to expect any great exertions in your favour. But when once there is a conviction, that the Americans are in earnest, that they are resolved to endure all hazards with a spirit worthy the prize, (and not till then) will you have many firm. active, persevering and powerful friends. For, strange as it may feem, there is a great doubt here, among many, whether you are really in earnest, in the full force and extent of those words."

[Dec. 12] Lord ____ appeared a very warm friend to the Americans, and faid, "If they continue united, they must have all they ask." He particularly mentioned, that Lord M——, last sessions, assured the house of lords, that the plan they had laid would go down in America sine clade; and also, that he had the best intelligence what might be carried through there. His lordship had no doubt that such assurances was grounded on Hutchinson's information.

[Dec. 14.] To E_____. "Your countrymen must feal their cause with their blood. They must preserve a consistency. of character. THEY MUST NOT DELAY. They must -or be trodden down into the vileft vaffalage—the fcorn—the fpurn of their enemies—a by-word of infamy among all men."

[Dec. 16.] To E-___. "Permit me to congratulate my countrymen on the integrity and wisdom, with which the congress have conducted. Their policy, spirit and union, have confounded their foes, and inspired their friends. All parties agree in giving them a tribute of honor and applause. My Lord N- endeavoured to explain away his expression, "I will have America at my feet." Beware of the arts of negociation."

" By the way, there is no doubt but the ministry fent large fums to New-York in order to bribe your continental delegates. It was openly avowed and vindicated; and great boaff was made of ministerial success in this way, with the delegates from New-York. It was faid, that they had effected a dif-union which would be fatal to the cause of America. You can't well imagine the chagrin with which the ministry received the refult of that glorious body. They are viewed as the northern confletlation of glorious worthies, illuminating and warming the new world."

To Joseph Recd, esq; (of Philadelphia.)

[Dec. 17.] "Sure I am that the ministry have no where such fanguine hopes of a defection as from that quarter (New-York.) Their influence is no where so forcibly extended; it is certain they will be associated. Lord C—— said in the house of lords, the other day, "Were I an American, I would resist to the last drop of my blood." Your parliamentary friends say, fnatch the opportunity for peace and reconciliation. Your sanguine and warm partizans say, "You are united and inspired now, circumstances that may never happen again. Seize the happy and glorious opportunity for establishing the freedom and social felicity of all America. There is a tide in the affairs of men."

[Jan. 2, 1775.] While (at Bath) viewing the most magnificently elegant new rooms, in company with colonel Barre, he faid, pointing to the pictures taken from the ruins found at Herculaneum, "I hope you have not the books containing the draughts of those ruins with you." I replied, "There was one fet I believed in the public library at our college." "Keep them there (faid he) and they may be of some service as a matter of curiofity for the speculative, but let them get abroad and you are ruined. They will infuse a taste for buildings and sculpture; and when a people get a tafte for the fine arts, they are ruined. 'Tis, tafle that ruins, whole kingdoms. 'Tis tafte that depopulates whole nations. I could not help weeping when I furveyed the ruins at Rome. All the remains of the Roman grandeur are of works which were finished, when Rome and the spirit of Romans were no more, unless I except the ruins of the Emilian baths. Mr. Quincy, let your countrymen beware of tafte in their buildings, equipage, and dress, as a deadly poison."

Colonel Barre also added in the course of conversation,—About sourteen or sisten years ago, I was through a considerable part of your country; for in the expedition against Canada, my business called me to pass by land through Peansylvania, New-Jersey, York and Albany; and when I returned again to this country, I was often speaking of America, and could not help speaking well of its climate, foil, and inhabitants; for you must know, sir, America was always a favorite with me. But will you believe it, fir, yet I assure you it is true, more than two-thirds of this island at that time, thought the Americans were all negroes." I replied, "I did not in the least doubt it, for if I was to judge by the late acts of parliament, I should suppose that a majority of the people of Great-Britain still thought so, for I sound that their representatives still treated them as Vol. I.

fuch." He finiled and the discourse dropped. The colonel was

[Dec. 20.] Attended the debates of the house of lords.—Good fortune gave me one of the best places for taking a few minutes.

Lord Chatham rose like Marcellus. "Viros superiment omnes." He seemed to feel himself superior to those around him. His language, voice, and gesture, were more pathetic than I ever saw or heard before at the bar or senate. He seemed like an old Roman senator, rising with the dignity of age, yet speaking with the fire of youth.

The illustrious fage stretched forth his hand with the decent folemnity of a Paul, and rifing with his subject, he smote his breast with the energy and grace of a Demosthenes. He opened with some general observations, on the importance and magnitude of the American quarrel (as he called it.) He enlarged upon the dangerous and ruinous events that were coming upon the nation, in consequence of the present dispute, and the measures already begun and now carrying on by his majesty's ministers. He arraigned their conduct with great severity and freedom. He then proceeded:

" My lords, these papers from America, now laid for the first time before your lordships, have been, to my knowledge, five or fix weeks in the pocket of the minister. And notwithstanding the fate of this kingdom hangs upon the event of this great controversy, we are but this moment called to a consideration of this important subject. My lords, I do not want to look into one of those papers; I know their contents well enough already. I know that there is not a member in this house but is acquainted with their purport also. There ought therefore to be no delay in entering upon this matter; we ought to proceed to it immediately. We ought to feize the first moment to open the door of reconciliation. The Americans will never be in a temper or flate to be reconciled (they ought not to be) till the troops are withdrawn. The troops are a perpetual irritation to these people: they are a bar to all confidence, and all cordial reconcilement. I therefore, my lords, move-That an humble address be prefented to his majesty, most humbly to advise and beseech his majesty, that, in order to open the way towards an happy fettlement of the dangerous troubles in America, by beginning to allay ferments, and foften animofities there; and above all, for preventing, in the mean time, any fudden and fatal catastroplie at Boston, now suffering under the daily irritation of an army, before their eyes, posted in their town, it may graciously please his majesty, that immediate orders may be dispatched to general general Gage, for removing his majesty's forces from the town of Boston, as soon as the rigor of the season, and other circumstances indispensible to the fafety and accommodation of the faid troops, may render the fame practicable."

"The way, my lords, mult be immediately opened for reconciliation. It will foon be too late. I know not who advised the present measures. I know not who advises to a perseverance and enforcement of them; but this I will fay, that whoever advises them ought to answer for it, at his utmost peril.— I know that no one will avow, that he advised, or that he was the author of these measures: every one shrinks from the charge. But fomebody has advifed his majesty to these measures, and if his majesty continues to hear such evil counsellors, his majesty will be undone. His majesty indeed may wear his crown; but the American jewel out of it, it will not be worth

" What more shall I say? I must not say, that the king is betrayed; but this I will fay, the NATION is ruined. What foundation have we for our claims over America? What is our right to perfift in fuch cruel and vindictive measures against that loyal and respectable people? They say you have no right to tax them without their confent. They fay truly. Representation and taxation must go together: they are inseparable. Yet there is hardly a man in our streets, though so poor as scarce to be able to get his daily bread, but thinks he is the legislator of America. Our American subjects is a common phrase in the mouth of the lowest orders of our citizens; but property, my lords, is the fole and entire dominion of the owner: it excludes all the world befides the owner. None can intermeddle with it. It is a unity; a mathematical point. It is an atom; untangible by any but the proprietor. Touch it—and the owner loses his whole property. The touch contaminates the whole mass; the whole property vanishes. The touch of another annihilates itfor whatever is a man's own, is absolutely and exclusively his own."

" In the last parliament all was anger-all was rage. Administration did not consider what was practicable, but what was revenge. Sine clade victoria was the language of the ministry last fessions, but every body knew, an idiot might know, that such would not be the iffue. But the ruin of the nation was a matter of no concern, if administration might be revenged. Americans were abused, misrepresented, and traduced in the most attrocious manner, in order to give a colour, and urge on to the most precipitate, unjust, cruel, and vindictive measures that ever difgraced a nation."

" My lords, the very infernal spirits, they chastife, castigatque: fed auaitque, my lords. The very spirits of the infernal regions HEAR before they punish. But how have these respectable people behaved under all their grievances? With unexampled patience, with unparalleled wisdom. They chose delegates by their free fuffrages: no bribery, no corruption, no INFLUENCE here, my lords. Their representatives meet with the sentiments and temper, and speak the sense of the continent. For genuine fagacity, for fingular moderation, for folid wifdom, manly fpirit, fublime fentiments and fimplicity of language, for every thing respectable and honorable, the congress of Philadelphia thine unrivalled. This wife people fpeak out. They do not hold the language of flaves: they tell you what they mean.-They do not ask you to repeal your laws as a favour: they claim it as a right: they demand it. They tell you, they will not fubmit to them: and I tell you the acts must be repealed; they will be repealed; you cannot enforce them. The ministry are checker-mated. They have a move to make on the board; and yet not a move but they are ruined.

Repeal, therefore, my lords, I fay. But bare repeal will not fatisfy this enlightened and spirited people. What ! repeal a bit of paper: repeal a piece of parchment! That alone won't do, my lords. You must go through. You must declare you have no right to tax; then they may trust you; then they will have confidence in you. I have heard a noble lord speak, who feemed to lay fome blame upon general Gage. I think that honorable gentleman has behaved with great prudence and becoming caution. He has entrenched himself and strengthened his fortifications. I don't know what he could do more. His fittiation puts me in mind of a fimilar transaction in the civil wars of France, when the great Conde on one fide, and Marshall Turenne on the other, with large armies lay many weeks very near each other. Turenne, conscious of the terrible consequences of a victory to himfelf and country, though the armies were feveral days in fight of each other, never came to a battle. On his return to the court of France, the gucen asked him, "Why, Marshall, I think you lay several days in fight of your enemy, and you might have been up with him at any time; pray why did you not take him?" The general very shrewdly replied, " Should I have taken him, please your majesty, I was afraid all Paris would have taken me." --- My lords, there are three millions of whigs. Three millions of whigs, my lords, with arms in their hands, are a very formidable body. 'Twas the

-whigs, my lords, that fet his majefty's royal ancestors upon the throne of England. I hope, my lords, there are yet double the number of whigs in England that there are in America. I hope the whigs of both countries will join and make a common cause. Ireland is with the Americans to a man. The whigs of that country will, and those of this country ought, to think the American cause their own. They are allied to each other in fentiment and interest, united in one great principle of defence and refishance; they ought therefore, and will run to embrace and support their brethren. The cause of ship-money was the cause of all the whigs of England. You shall not take my money without my consent, is the doctrine and language of whigs. It is the doctrine and voice of whigs in America, and whigs here. It is the doctrine in support of which I do not know how many names I could—I may call in this house: among the living I cannot fay how many I could, to join with me and maintain these doctrines with their blood; but among the dead I could raife an host innumerable. And, my lords, at this day, there are very many found, fubftantial, honest whigs, who ought and who will confider the American controverfy as a great common caufe."

"My lords, confishent with the preceding doctrines, and with what I have ever and shall continue to maintain, I say, I shall oppose America whenever I see her aiming at throwing off the navigation act, and other regulatory acts of trade, made bona side for that purpose, and wisely framed and calculated for reciprocation of interest, and the general extended welfare and security of the whole empire. It is suggested such is their design. I see no evidence of it. But to come at a certain knowledge of their fentiments and designs on this head, it would be proper first to do them justice. Treat them as subjects, before you treat them

"My lords, deeply impressed with the importance of taking some healing measures at this most alarming distracted state of our affairs, though bowed down with a cruel disease, I have crawied to this house, to give you my best experience and council; and my advice is to beseech his majesty, &c. &c. This is the best I can think of. It will convince America, that you mean to try her cause in the spirit and by the laws of freedom and fair inquiry, and not by codes of blood. How can she now trust you, with the bayonet at her breast? She has all the reason in the world now to believe you mean her death or bondage."

"Thus entered on the threshhold of this business, I will knock tyour gates for justice without ceasing, unless inveterate infirmities slay my hand. My lords, I pledge myself never to leave this business: I will pursue it to the end in every shape. I will never fail of my attendence on it, at every step and period of this great matter, unless nailed down to my bed by the severity of disease. My lords, there is no time to be lost; every moment is big with dangers. Nay, while I am now speaking, the decifive blow may be ftruck, and millions involved in the confequence. The very first drop of blood will make a wound. that will not eafily be skinned over. Years, perhaps ages may not heal it. It will be irritabile vulnus, a wound of that rancorous malignant, corroding, festering nature, that in all probability it will mortify the whole body. Let us then, my lords, fet to this business in earnest, not take it up by bits and scraps as formerly, just as exigencies pressed, without any regard to the general relations, connections and dependencies. I would not by any thing I have faid, my lords, be thought to encourage America to proceed beyond the right line. I reprobate all acts of violence by her mobility, but when her inherent constitutional rights are invaded, those rights that she has an equitable claim to the full enjoyment of, by the fundamental laws of the English conflitution, and ingrafted thereon by the unalterable laws of nature, then I own myself an American, and feeling myself such, shall, to the verge of my life, vindicate those rights against all men, who strive to trample upon or oppose them.'

From the effects of this speech on the great audience without the bar, and from my own emotions and feelings, the miracles of ancient eloquence—the blaze of genius and the burst of thought—with which Grecian and Roman orators have been said to work wonders in the senate and the field, no longer appeared fabulous.

Lord Camden spoke next on the side of America and in support of the motion. He equalled lord Chatham in every thing, but that fire and pathos which are the forte of his lordship. In learning, perspicuity and pure cloquence, probably no one ever furpaffed Lord Camden.

His lordship opened briefly upon the nature of property, the right of taxation, and its inseparability from representation. "My lords (he said) I will not enter into the large field of collateral reasoning applicable to the abstruct distinctions touching the omnipotence of parliament. The declaratory law sealed my mouth. But this I will say, not only as a statesman, politician and philosopher, but as a COMMON LAWYER, my lords, you have no right to tax America. I have searched the matter. I repeat it, my lords, you have no right to tax America. The natural rights of man and the immutable laws of nature are all with that people. Much stress is laid on the supreme legislative authority of Great-Britain, and so far as the doctrine is directed to its proper object I accede to it. But it is equally true, according to all approved writers on government, that no man, agreeable to the principles of natural or civil liberty, can be divested of any part of his property without his confent. Every thing has been staked on this fingle polition, that acts of parliament must be obeybut this general, unconditional, unlimited affertion, I am far from thinking applicable to every possible case, that may arise in the turn of times. For my part, I imagine, that a power, refulting from a trust, arbitrarily exercised, may be lawfully refifted; whether the power is lodged in a collective body, or fingle person, in the few or the many. However modified makes no difference. Whenever the trust is wrested to the injury of the people, whenever oppression begins, all is unlawful and unjust, and resistance of course becomes lawful and right. fome lords tell us feriously, that administration must reduce the Americans to obedience and submission, that is, you must make them absolute and infamous flaves, and then-what? We will, fay they, give them full liberty. Ah! is this the nature of man? No, my lords, I would not trust myself, American as I am, in this fituation. I do not think I should, in that case, be myself for giving of them liberty. No, if they submitted to such unjust, fuch cruel, such degrading slavery, I should think they were made for flaves; that fervility was fuited to their nature and genius. I should think they would best serve this country as their slaves; that their fervility would be for the benefit of Great-Britain; and I should be for keeping such Cappadocians in a state of servitude, fuch as was fuited to their constitution, and might redound much. to our advantage."

"My lords, fome noble lords talk very much of refishance to acts of parliament. King, lords and commons are fine founding names. But, my lords, acts of parliament have been refished in all ages. King, lords and commons may become tyrants as well as others. Tyranny in one or more is the fame. It is as lawful to refish the tyranny of many as of one. Somebody once asked the great Mr. Seldon, in what law book, in what records or archieves of the state you might find the law for resisting tyranny. "I don't know, (said Mr. Selden) whether it is worth your while to look deeply into the books upon this matter; but I'll tell you what is most certain, that it has always been the custom of England—and the custom of England is the law of the

"There is a gentleman, whom I need not name, his works are well received and well known, who avoids stating any rule, when resistance is lawful; and he lays down the revolution as the only precedent.

precedent. He fays, that the various circumstances, events and incidents, that may justify cannot be defined; but the people at large will judge of their welfare and happiness, and act accordingly. The same writer says, that whenever a case exactly similar in all its parts and circumstances to the revolution, when a case shall run upon all fours with that, then the law seems to be settled, that resistance is lawful. I do not pretend to quote his words. I think his meaning is very much as 1 have stated it. But undoubtedly in cases, in many respects dissimilar, but in equal degree tyrannical and oppressive, resistance may be lawful, and the people in all ages, countries and climes have at times known these things; and they have and will for ever act accordingly."

Lord Shelburne, in the course of his argument, said, "My lords, we know, we all know, that justice and injustice, right and wrong are not at all considered in the course of our parliamentary proceedings. We all know that nothing is debated in parliament for information or conviction, but for mere form. Every thing is considered in the cabinet and brought into parliament, and not for consideration, but for the sanction of the legislature, and the screening the counsellors of the king. The measures of parliament are the measures of the minister; and the measures of this minister are very often those of his commissioner." The Marquis of Rockingham also supported the motion.

Lords Littleton, Suffolk, Gower, Townsend, Rochford and Weymouth, spoke in opposition. I omit relating what their lordships faid, lest I should be suspected by any who may see this journal, of an unfair report of their speeches. But a very remarkable saying of Lord G——I cannot omit. His lordship said, "I am for enforcing these measures (and with great sneer and contempt) let the Americans sit talking about their natural and divine rights, their rights as men and citizens, their rights from God and nature."

The house, at about ten, divided after the preceding debates, on the question, contents 18, non-contents 77, including proxies.

Thus far from Mr. Quincy's papers.

The language of the lords in administration was high and decifive. And it was declared, that the mother country should never relax till America confessed her supremacy, and it was acknowledged to be the ministerial resolution, to enforce obedience by arms.

The principal trading and manufacturing towns in the kingdom, having waited to regulate their conduct as to American affairs, by that of the merchants of London and Briftol, followed the example of these two great commercial bodies, and prepared petitions upon that subject to be presented to parlia-

[Jan. 23.] The petition from the merchants of London was of courfe the first delivered, and it was moved to be referred to the committee, appointed to take into consideration the American papers; but it was moved by way of amendment, on the ministerial side, that it should be referred to a separate committee to meet on the 27th, the day succeeding that appointed for the confideration of American papers. This was objected to as a shameful pitiful evasion; but upon the question's being put, the amendment was carried, 197 against 81, who supported the original motion.

A fimilar fate attended the petitions from Briftol, Glafgow, Norwich, Liverpool, Manchefter, Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Dudley, and fome other places; all of which, in turn, were configned to what the opposition termed the committee of obli-Vion.

[Jan. 26.] On the day appointed for the confideration of American affairs, a fecond and very firong petition was prefented from the merchants of London. On which it was moved, that the order for referring the merchants petition to a separate committee should be discharged, and that it should be referred to a committee of the whole house, appointed to consider the American affairs. The indignity and mockery offered to fo great a body as the merchants of London by the late resolution, which with an infidious affectation of civility, received the petition with one hand, and threw it out of the window with the other, was painted in strong colours. All the debates, on the subject of the petitions, were attended with an unufual degree of afperity, and even acrimony on the fide of opposition. The conduct also of the late parliament was ferutinized without mercy, and its memory treated with more than want of respect. 'A gentleman, remarkable for a farcastic poignancy in his observations, in sketching a short history of that parliament, said, that they began their political life with a violation of the facred right of election in the case of Middlesex; that they had died in the act of popery, when they established the Roman catholic religion in Canada; and that they had left a rebellion in America, as a legacy. The question was rejected upon a division by a very great majo-

Though it was then late; a petition was offered from Mr. Bollan, Dr. Franklin, and Mr. Lee, stating that they were authorised by the American continental congress, to present a petition from the congress to the king, which petition his majesty had referred to that house, and that they were enabled to throw great light upon the subject: they prayed to be heard at the bar, in support of the faid petition. A violent debate enfued. The miniftry alledged, that the congress was no legal body, and none could be heard in reference to its proceedings, without giving that illegal body fome degree of countenance. It was answered, that the congress, however illegal as to other purposes, was sufficiently legal for prefenting a petition. It was figured by the names of all the persons who composed it, and might be received as from individuals. It was faid, That it was their business rather to find every plaufible reason for receiving petitions, than to invent pretences for rejecting them: that the rejection of petitions was one principal, if not the most powerful cause of the present troubles: and that this mode of constantly rejecting their petitions, and refuling to hear their agents, would infallibly end in univerfal rebellion, and not unnaturally, as those feem to give up the rights of government, who refuse to hear the complaints of the subject. The ministry insulted the petition as containing nothing but pretended grievances, while they refused to hear and discuss it. It was rejected by 218 to 68. This rejection must have been forefeen by all who knew, that on the fourth of the month, Lord Dartmouth, by the king's orders, had written a circular letter to the governors of his majesty's colonies, requiring them to use, their utmost endeavours to prevent the holding of any more congreffes; and that the American grievances were, in that letter, termed pretended. This letter was written a few days after the petition had met with an apparent gracious reception, and had been promifed a due confideration; but probably not before favorable advices had been received respecting the New-York as-

It was evident, that both houses of parliament were ready to adopt any measures which administration should propose; and it was considently believed and afferted, that when the merchants and manufacturers were deprived of all hopes of preventing the operation of force, it would then become their interest to give all possible effect to it. They would thus become by degrees, a principal support of that cause, which they now so eagerly op-

The opinion of the efficacy of a forcible mode of proceeding in America, and the hopes of compelling a great body at home to concurrence, have made the unnifters more and more refolved to go through, and complete the plan with which they have begun. It may however be much doubted, whether they suffect that the American contest will end in blood. Some of them in all probability have such a firm reliance upon Mr. Hutchinson's indepent

judgment, as to flatter themselves that the colonists will give way to those appearances of coercion, which they have adopted, and mean further to adopt; and so have engaged in the present hazardous politics, in hopes of enjoying a bloodless conquett, and therein a complete triumph over all opposition.

[Feb. 1.] Lord Chatham perfevered in the profecution of his conciliatory scheme with America, and accordingly brought into the house of lords the outlines of a bill, which he hoped would answer that falutary purpose, under the title of "A provincial act for settling the troubles in America, and for afferting the suppreme legislative authority, and superintending power of Great-Britain over the colonies.

This bill caused a variety of discussion within and without doors. The ministry observed, that it was a proposition of reconciliation by concession, which was cause sufficient to induce them to reject it; their plan being, at present, to show a firm resolution not to give way in any instance, while the opposition in America continued. It was unufual in parliament to reject, on the first proposition, any bill for an object allowed to be neceffary; and promifing, however faintly or rudely, any plan for obtaining the end proposed. But the proceeding on this occasion was different. They condemned without referve the bill in the whole, and in all its parts; and it was moved, and ftrongly supported by all the lords on the fide of administration, that the bill be rejected in the first instance. The noble framer defended himself and his bill from the numerous attacks which were made on both, with great spirit and vigor. The indignity offered him, seemed to renew all the fire of youth; and he retorted the farcalins, which were levelled at him from different quarters, with a most pointed feverity. The nature of the subjects debated, and the state of temper on both fides, produced much warmth, fevere altercation, and even personal animadversion. The bill was rejected by a majority of 61 to 32, not being allowed to lie upon the table. The rejection of it may be of no differvice to the colonists. It contained in it, a proposal to require of congress the making of a free grant to the king, of a certain perpetual revenue, subject to the disposition of the British parliament; and congress was to adjust the proportions of the several charges to be borne by each province, toward the general contributory supply. Had it paffed into an act, the colonists might not have united in the propofal, but dangerous divisions have followed, so that you may have no occasion to regret its fate, especially as that will threngthen your union, and increase your friends.

A petition was prefented to the commons, from the planters of the fugar colonies refiding in Great-Britain, and the merchants of London trading to those colonies, fetting forth the distress to which the West-India islands will be reduced, unless the former harmony between this kingdom and the American colonies is re-Like all the former upon the fubject, it was referred to the established petition-committee. The day it was presented, the minister opened his defigns in respect to America. Having prepared the way by a speech, he moved for an address to the king, and for a conference with the lords, that it might be the joint' address of both houses. The address rearns thanks for the communication of the American papers; and declares, that they find from them, that a rebellion actually exists within the province of the Massachusetts-bay; that the parties concerned in it have been. countenanced and encouraged by unlawful combinations and engagements entered into, in feveral of the other colonies; that they never can relinquish any part of the sovereign authority over all the dominions, which by law is vested in his majesty and the two houses of parliament; that they ever have been, and always shall be, ready to pay attention and regard to any real grievances of any of his majefty's subjects, which shall in a dutiful and conflitutional manner be laid before them; but at the fame time they befeech his majefty to take the most effectual measures to enforce due obedience to the authority of the supreme legislature; and in the most solemn manner assure him, that at the hazard of their lives and properties, they will fland by him against all rebellious attempts, in the maintenance of the just rights of his majesty and the two houses of parliament.

Lord North then gave a sketch of the measures he intended to purfue, which were to fend a greater force to America, and to bring in a temporary act to put a stop to all the foreign trade of the different colonies of New-England, particularly their fishery on the banks of Newfoundland, till they returned to their

The address was so loaded with consequences, the extent of which could not be defined, that it called up all the powers of opposition; and even some few of the most moderate in the house seemed to feel a kind of horror, at entering upon a meafure fo dangerous in the tendency, and inexplicable in the

A gentleman, of the first eminence in the law, followed the minister through the whole detail of his speech, and answered the different positions. He insisted, that having examined with legal precision the definitions of treason, the Americans were not in rebellion, and faid, "Whatever the diforders may be, they are created by the conduct of those, whose views are to establish defpotifm, and which are manifestly directed to reduce America to the most abject flate of servility, as a prelude to the realizing the same wicked system in the mother country." He concluded by maintaining, that an opposition to arbitrary measures is warranted by the constitution, and established by precedent.

The other gentlemen of the minority entered but little into the juridical part of the debate; but maintained, that it would be imprudent for parliament at this time to declare the disturbances rebellious. They said, "It is well known no act of violence has been committed in the Massachusetts-bay, which has not been equalled by something similar in every other province, and sometimes even exceeded by acts of a more heinous nature; that therefore the only effect of this violent, but partial declaration of rebellion, will be to delude ourselves into preparations of hostility, as if against one province only, when in truth we have to contend with twelve."

On the other fide, the crown lawyers and ministerial debaters maintained, that fuch Americans as come within certain descriptions, and have been guilty of certain acts, and still persevere in the support and commission of such acts, are in a state of actual rebellion; that the punishment of a few of the worst fort of traitors, fuch as Hancock and his crew, may be fufficient to teach the rest their duty in future; and that the boasted union of the colonies will dissolve the moment parliament shows itself resolved on vigorous and fevere measures. Some gentlemen of rank in the army, treated all idea of refistance by the Americans with the utmost contempt. They faid, "They are neither foldiers, nor ever can be made fo, being naturally of a pufillanimous disposition, and utterly incapable of any fort of order or discipline; and by their laziness, uncleanliness, and radical defect of constitution. they are disabled from going through the service of a campaign, but will melt away with fickness, before they can face an enemy; fo that a flight force will be more than fufficient for their complete reduction." Many ludicrous flories to that purport were told, greatly to the entertainment of the house. A motion however was made for an amendment, which upon a division was rejected by a large majority, 304 against 105. The question being then put for the address, was carried by nearly the same

But the minority had not done with the business. [Feb. 5.] Upon receiving the report from the committee a few days after, a noble lord made a motion to recommit the address; and supported it with many arguments. He stated our domestic situation, and interred the impropriety and danger of a declaration from that house of the existence of a rebellion in any part of our dominions; and showed the desperate measures into which it might

precipitate the Americans, and the advantage that might be taken of fuch an occasion by our powerful and watchful neighbours, whose ancient enmity and jealousy were much increased by the glory we had acquired, and the disgrace and loss they had suffered in the last war. He said, "My head and my heart join in deprecating the horrors of a civil war, which will be rendered still more dreadful, by its involving in it certain consequences, a foreign one with the combined forces of great and powerful nations."

This motion introduced the longest and most interesting debate that had taken place in the new parliament. It was acknowledged on all hands, that the present criss was the most perilous and intricate, in which the nation had been involved since the revolution. It was contended by those who opposed the motion, that the Americans were not to be won by kindness or retained by benefits, and that the tenderness, which had been constantly practised by government, had produced the present statal consequences. The danger from foreign powers supporting the Americans, was said to be imaginary: and it was still contended by several, that an appearance of vigorous measures, with some reinforcement of the troops at Boston, would prove sufficient to quell the disturbances in America, without the drawing of blood.

On the other fide, the address was fligmatized as cruel, fanguinary, and unjust. It was urged, "The Americans have given the strongest and most unequivocal demonstrations of their filial piety toward the mother country. They have fought and bled by our fide. In the present state of distraction, they require no more for the reftoration of harmony, than to be placed in the fame fituation they were in at the close of the last war. They have been nurfed up, for a long feries of years, in ideas of certain rights, of which, the electing of their own reprefentatives, and the disposal of their own money for the public service only through them, are among the principal. If this is an error, the crown and parliament are equally faulty with the Americans, having in their whole conduct constantly nourished the delusion. At the time of the repeal of the stamp-act, two of the first names of this kingdom, for ability as well as legal knowledge, befide many others, utterly denied the right of taxation. Is it then to be wondered at, that the Americans, with fuch authorities on their fide, are tenacious of a right fo invaluable in its nature, which has at all times been confidered as the diffinction between freemen and flaves, which has been confirmed by fo long a prefeription, and upon which, to this instant, the wifest and honestest men, even in the mother country, are divided in opinion?-Philip the fecond, and his feventeen provinces, are the counterpart of what we are acting. In comparing the probability of events, can any man fay, Great-Britain has such a prospect of victory in the event as Spain might then have expected? If we imagine that the powers of Europe will fit shill during this contest, we must suppose a system of policy now to prevail, or rather an extension of folly, all over Europe, which never before was known in any period of its existence."

Much ill temper appeared in every part of the house in the course of these debates. The ministry were charged with acting uniformly and systematically upon tory and arbitrary principles, which had thrown the whole empire into a state of confusion and distraction. "In a word," it was said, "the short and simple question before the house, is, whether we shall lose the colonies,

The ministry, on the other hand, talked much about faction at home, and republican principles; and the Americans being spirited up to their rebellion by incendiary writers and speakers in England. After a debate, which continued till half an hour after two in the morning, the motion for the recommitment of the address was rejected by nearly the former majority.

When it was moved in the house of lords, to fill up the blank, left open in the address, by the infertion of the words, " The lords spiritual and temporal, &c." to render the instrument the joint act of both houses, a debate ensued. The questions of treafon, rebellion and constructive treasons, were deeply entered into by two great law lords, who differed totally in their legal and political fentiments, and carried on a long argument between them, with great warmth and ability; in which a large flock of professional and general learning was displayed on each fide. It is to be lamented, that with all the boafted excellency of our constitution, a question of so vast magnitude as to include in its confequences, the lives, fortunes, and honors of all the subjects of this empire, still remains involved in such obscurity, as not only to admit of a difference of opinion, but that even the great oracles of the law are bewildered in its darkness. This extraordinary debate was attended with fome fingular circumstances. Lord Mansfield, to the great furprise of most of his auditors, condemned, in very explicit and unreferved terms, the measure of laying on the duties in 1767, which he declared to be the most abfurd and pernicious that could be advised, and the cause of all the present impending evils. The duke of Grafton, Lord Shelburne, and Lord Camden, who were at that time cabinet counfellors and held the first offices in the state, declared separately in their places, that they had no share in that measure, nor had ever given any approbation. The manner in which a measure of minifiry was carried against the opinion of ministers was not explained. A disclosure relative to a matter, which had already convulsed the whole empire, and was still more to be dreaded in its future consequences, excited general amazement, mixt with indignation and regret in individuals. The statal and over-ruling secret influence, which had so long guided and marred all public affairs, was deplored and animadverted upon in different parts of the house.

When the question came to be put, whether to agree with the commons in the address, by inserting the words necessary to fill up the blank, it was carried by a prodigious majority. But the lords Richmond, Craven, Archer, Abergavenny, Rockingham, Wycombe, Courtenay, Torrington, Ponsonby, Cholmondeley, Abingdon, Portland, Camden, Essingham, Stanhope, Scarborough, Fitzwilliain, and Tankerville, protested against "an address amounting to a declaration of war, which is founded on no proper parliamentary information, which follows the rejection of every mode of conciliation, which hold out no substantial offer of redress of grievances, and which promises support to those ministers, who have inflamed America, and grossly misconducted the affairs of Great-Britain."

[Feb. 9.] The address was delivered, and an answer given, wherein his majesty assured both houses, that they might depend upon his taking the most speedy and effectual measures for enforcing due obedience to the laws, and the authority of the fupreme legislature.

On that or the preceding day, the petition and memorial from the affembly of Jamaica to his majefty, was laid before the commons. It was drawn up in very frong terms. The petitioners entered into a full, free, and argumentative discussion of the late claims of the mother country, and of the rights of the colonies: the former of which they combated, and the latter defended with great force. They equally deplored and beheld with amazement, a plan almost carried into execution for reducing the colonies into the most abject slate of slavery; and they supplicated the throne, and demanded and claimed from the sovereign, as the guarantee of their just rights, that no laws should be forced upon them, injurious to their rights as colonists or Englishmen; and that, as the common parent of his people, his majesty would become a mediator between his European and American subjects.

[Feb. 10.]: The next day the minister moved for leave to bring in a bill to restrain the trade and commerce of the New-England provinces, to Great-Britain, Ireland, and the British West-India islands, and to prohibit them from carrying on any fishery on the banks of Newfoundland, and other places therein to be mentioned, under certain conditions, and for a limited time. In answer to the objections made to it while the subject of debate, the charges of injustice and cruelty were denied, and the contrary maintained; it was declared to be necessary; and it was observed, that though the innocent were involved with the guilty, and friends with foes, the necessity might be lamented, but could not be helped. The motion for a bill was carried by a majority of three to one. In the progress of the bill, the London merchants and traders, interested in the American commerce, petitioned against it, and were allowed to be heard. In confedence of this a long train of witnesses were examined, and it appeared, That in 1764, the four New-England colonies employed in their feveral fisheries, no less than 45,880 ton of shipping, and 6002 men, and that the produce of their fisheries in the foreign markets for that year, amounted to 322,220l. 16s. fterling: That the fisheries were greatly increased; that all the materials used in them, except falt, and the timber of which their veffels were built, were taken from this country, and that the next proceeds of the fish were remitted here; and that there was near a million of money owing from New-England to the city of London only. They stated to the house, that the calamities consequent upon the bill must fail in a particular degree upon the innocent. The case of the inhabitants of Nantucket would be particularly hard. They amounted to some thousands, nine-tenths of them Quakers, inhabiting a barren land: but by an aftonishing industry they kept 140 vessels in constant employ, eight in the importation of provisions for the island, and the rest in the whale fishery.

[Feb. 20.] While the bill was pending, lord North amazed all parties, and feemed for a time nearly to disfolve his own, by a conciliatory motion in regard to America. It proposed, " That when the governor, council, and affembly, or general court of his majesty's provinces or colonies, shall propose to make provifion, according to their respective conditions, circumstances, and fituations, for contributing their proportion to the common defence (fuch proportion to be raifed under the authorities of the general court, or general affembly, of fuch province or colony, and disposable by parliament) and shall engage to make provision alfo, for the support of the civil government, and the adminifration of justice in such province or colony, it will be proper, if fuch propofal should be approved by his majesty in parliament, and for fo long as such provision shall be made accordingly, to forbear, in respect of such province or colony, to levy any duties, tax, or affeffment; or to impose any further duty, tax, or VOL. I. Rr affellment.

affessiment, except only such duties as it may be expedient to impole for the regulation of the commerce, the nett produce of the duties last mentioned to be carried to the account of such province, colony, or plantation, respectively." The numerous high prerogative party, who had ever opposed any relaxation in favor of the colonies, heard the proposition with horror, and confidered themselves as abandoned or betrayed. They pronounced it a shameful prevarication, and a mean departure from principle; and finally concluded with declaring, that they would make no concessions to rebels with arms in their hands; and that they would enter into no measure for a fettlement with the Americans, in which an express and definitive acknowledgment from them of the supremacy of parliament was not a preliminary article. A gentleman of the long robe, and who has lately diffinguished himself for his zeal in promoting all the measures for reducing the colonies (Mr. W---) had the address in a few minutes to hush the commotion, by convincing the mal-contents, that the appearance of concession, lenity, and tenderness, which · had fo much alarmed them, were of fuch a nature, that they could not interfere with the most rigid measures which they wished to enforce. The gentlemen in opposition, faid, "The motion is infidious, base and treacherous, in the highest degree."— The minister acknowledged it to be a cheat, and deligned for the purpose of dis-uniting the Americans; but it will tend only to confolidate that common mass of union into which they have been thrown by the Boston port-act. The question was carried by a majority of three to one.

[Feb. 27.] A petition from the merchants, traders, and principal inhabitants of Poole, in Dorfetshire, was presented, in avowed opposition to that from London, and in support of the principles of the fishery-bill. This petition fet forth, that the refraints upon the colonies would not by any means be injurious to commerce; and that the foreign markets might be amply supplied, by extending the Newfoundland fishery from England.— They concluded by foliciting, no less for their own immediate advantage than for the universal benefit of their country, such

A petition was also delivered from the Quakers in behalf of their brethren and others, the inhabitants of Nantucket, in which they flated their innocence and industry, the utility of their labours to themselves and the community, the hazards attending their occupation, and the uncertainty of their gains; and thowed, that if the bill passed into a law, they must thortly be exposed to all the miseries of a famine.

In

In every stage of the bill, the debate rekindled; and, in the course of it, the minority observed, "When it was thought wifdom to overthrow established privileges, and to combat national prejudices, by flarting the new claim of taxation, the Americans went no further than to deny our right of internal taxation.-Having gained the point of urging them to question one right, we foon convinced them, both by argument and practice, that an external tax might be made to answer all the purposes, and to produce all the mischiefs of internal taxation. They then denied our right of taxing for fupply. Parliament then proceeded to deprive them of their charter, and to change the course of justice and trials. Then they were pushed to deny the power of internal legislation. But still they had hitherto never formally rejected the power of parliament to bind their trade. We are now to convince them, however, that if but a fingle branch of legiflative power is left to this country, we can distort that branch in fuch a manner, that it shall include all the purposes of unlimited tyranny." It appeared upon evidence at the bar of the house; that by the operation of the bill, many thousands of innocent inhabitants would be reduced to the fad alternative, either of perishing through want at home, or of removing to some other less rigorous government for protection and support; so that a famine among the New-Englanders was predicted as the confequence of the bill.

Some gentlemen on the other fide of the question, acknowledged the harshness of the measure; but lamented its being indispensably necessary. A much greater number contended, that the bill was in an high degree merciful, and that the New-England colonies did not want resources to prevent a famine. A few went so far as to regret, that the bill did not convey punishments adequate to the crimes of the Americans, and to dread that the famine which had been strongly prognosticated, and pathetically lamented, would not take place.

Mr. Quincy fails to-morrow for the Massachusetts. He is very far from being well; and has been attended upon repeatedly by Dr. Fothergill. The doctor thinks the Bristol air and water would give him perfect health; and it is greatly against his own opinion and inclination that he takes the voyage. But he risks his life for the good of his own colony in particular, and of America in general. His most intimate friends insist upon his going directly to Boston. They say no letter can go with safety; and that he can deliver more information and advice viva voce, than can or ought to be written. They urge that by going now, if he arrives safe, he must be of great advantage to the American cause.

He is to tell the people of your colony, by no means to take any flep of great confequence (unless on a fudden emergency) without the advice of the continental congress; and is to repair to that honorable body, when met at Philadelphia.

You will hear from him, how egregiously the Americans have been infulted by feveral in both houses of parliament, in being pronounced daftardly cowards and poltroons, to be looked into Submission at the approach of a regiment; and that if this is your true character, there will be no great exploit in the brave general Grant's marching fuccessfully, with only five regiments from one end of the continent to the other, of which he has declared himself capable. It is said, that an American durst not look at a red coat. The fenator holds this language in the fenate; and the general at the head of an army. It paties for a maxim, and it is thought fcepticifm to doubt it. Every fubaltern upon half pay looks upon himfelf as qualified for fubduing America. If a man fays otherwise, the finger is pointed at him as to an enemy of his country. Mr. Quincy will be likely also to give you the name of the member, who in a late speech adulterated the English tongue, that he might gratify his inveteracy. by punishing you with starvation.

By a future opportunity you will receive an account of the progress of the restraining and fishery bill through the house of Jords; of the further proceedings of parliament and ministry;

LETTER XII.

Roxbury, April 26, 1775.

HILE the Massachusetts had no provincial congress, the active friends of government had an opportunity to try their strength in a few places, and to attempt refissing the general current, by refusing a compliance with the resolutions of the colony congress; but the differnments were overwhelmed by numbers, and their attempts proved abortive.

The royal proclamation prohibiting the exportation of military flores from Britain, his majefty's speech, and the addresses of the new parliament, in the opinion of many, cut off all hopes of reconciliation, more especially in New-England.

[Feb. 1. | The new Massachusetts congress met at Cambridge. and Mr. Hancock was unanimously chosen president. They adjourned to Concord in about a fortnight, that the distance might afford them greater perfonal fecurity, and render them less liable to interruption by any measures of the governor. That the colony might be fomewhat prepared for the forest trial, they urged in the strongest terms, the militia in general, and the minute men in particular, to spare neither time, pains nor expence, at so critical a juncture, for perfecting themselves forthwith in the military discipline. They passed resolutions for the providing and making of fire arms and bayonets, and renewed the prohibition of their predeceffors, against supplying the troops at Boston, with any of those necessaries peculiarly requisite for the military service. The committee of satety had directed in the beginning of January, that all the cannon, mortars, cannon balls and shells, should be deposited at Worcester and Concord, in the same proportion as was done by the provision; and while the congress was sitting, [Feb. 13, 21.] voted, "that the committee of fupplies do purchase all the powder they can, and also all kinds of warlike stores, sufficient for an army of sisteen thoufand men to take the field.',

prife was manifest from the following event.

[Feb. 26.] General Gage receiving intelligence that cannon and carriages were deposited in the neighbourhood of Salem, fent a corps of troops from the castle, under lieutenant colonel Leslie, on board a transport, to seize and bring them away. They landed at Marblehead, proceeded to Salem, found nothing there, and passed on to the draw-bridge leading to Danvers, where a number of people assembled, and those of the opposite side took up the bridge to prevent their croffing. The officer ordered it to be let down; the people peremptorily refused, faying, "It is a private road, and you have no authority to demand a passage this way." On this refusal he determined to make use of the boats which were at hand; his intention was perceived, and the owners jumped into their own boats, and with their axes scuttled them, to make them useless for the present; during the transaction there was some scuffle between them and the foldiers. Things were apparently tending to an extremity. The reverend Mr. Bernard, a congregational clergyman of Salem, and other gentlemen, urged the letting down of the draw-bridge; but it was not done, till much time had been spent in altercation, during which period the articles that colonel Leslie was after, were conveyed away. When the opportunity of croffing offered, he marched about thirty rods, to the fpot where the artificers had been employed in making carriages, &c. but finding nothing, and it being now late in the evening, returned and went on board the transport without meeting with any molestation. This expedition took place on the Lord's day, which might contribute to its ending happily without mischief. On any other day, when the people were not attending public worship, but dispersed about and following their secular business, the landing of the troops would have been discovered, and some quarrel might have ensued while they were making it good, or afterward upon their march. The governor probably pitched upon the Lord's day, in hope that it would prevent every painful catastrophe; but the expedition fpread an alarm.

The Maffachufetts congress were displeased with the proceedings of the New-York general affembly; who renounced all concern with the late continental congress, declined choosing delegates for the proposed new one, and in their own single capacity, fent a petition to the king, a memorial to the lords, and a remonstrance to the house of commons. In the remonstrance they reprefented the grievances, under which they laboured, by the innovations that had been made in the conflitutional mode of government, fince the close of the last war. They renounced the most distant desire of independence, acknowledged the supreme government of the British parliament over the whole empire, and their authority to regulate the trade of the colonies: remonstrated in the behalf of their brethren in the Massachusetts, for whose distresses they could not help feeling; but at the same time expressed their disapprobation of the violent measures purfued in some of the colonies. They claimed a restoration of those rights which they enjoyed before the close of the war; but without entertaining an idea of diminishing the power of the mother country, or lessening the dignity of parliament. Should the ministry embrace the opening thus given by the general affembly of New-York, they may possibly separate this central province from the others, and break the communication between the northern and the fouthern, But the apprehension of such an event is abated by the intelligence, which the Maffachufetts congress have received from the city of New-York. The whig citizens, whose hearts were fet upon having delegates for the new continental congress, upon the affembly's declining to appoint them, contrived to collect their fellow citizens [Mar. 5.] together in order to obtain their opinion. When affembled in a body, there was a confused cry of "Congress or no Congress?" After much altercation, the tories had a recourse to compulfive compulfive reasoning, and began dealing about their blows.— The whigs were in the worst situation, not being provided with similiar arguments, till two of their party repaired to an adjoining cooper's yard, from whence they drew forth to the assistance of their friends a number of hoop-sticks, which they reduced to a proper length, and forwarded to the combatants. The whigs, being thus supplied, soon carried the day by club law, and beat their opponents off the ground. The tories, being worsted, and not a little terrified, less the fury of captain (whom they term in a way of reproach king) Sears should lead him to head a mob, and do them some capital injury, promoted a provincial convention, which otherwise would not have existed. The battle royal at New-York will prove the turning point as to that colony.

The Massachusetts congress continued their session, and recommended the fixteenth of March to be observed as the annual day for fasting and prayer, which was kept accordingly, by the inhabitants of Boston, no less than of the country. But they did not prefume to rely upon religious exercifes in the neglect of those civil means which prudence prescribed. The people, both within and without, used every device for conveying safely from Boston into the country, all kinds of military articles, which might be wanted in case of a rupture. Cannon, balls, and fuch like heavy flores, were put into carts and carried out over the neck, under the appearance of loads of dung. Half barrels of gunpowder were put into butchers peds, or the hampers of the market people, and brought out under fome flight negligent and unsuspected cover, as they returned home in the evening. Catridges were packed up in candle-boxes, and fent off under that deception; but fome were at length discovered. The foldiers on the neck did not make many prizes; however one day, [March 18.] they feized 13,425 musket cartridges, with 3000lb. weight of ball, which, though private property, the general was warranted in refuling to restore, on the application of the owner.

That gen. Gage might not fucceed in feizing any military flores in the country, should he fend out troops upon that errand, the committee of fafety had voted four days before, "that members from this committee belonging to Charlestown, Cambridge and Roxbury, be defired to procure at least two men, for a warch every night to be placed in each of these towns, and that said members be in readiness to send couriers forward to the towns where the magazines are placed, when sallies are made from the army at night."

[April 23.] The selectmen of the town of Billerica presented a most spirited remonstrance to general Gage, on account of an inhabitant of that town's being tarred and feathered, and much abused on the 8th of the month, by a party of his majesty's 47th regiment, under the command of lieutenant-colonel Neshit. The firmness, resolution and freedom, with which the people both of town and country have conducted, when their business called them to an intercourse with the governor, have often embarrassed and convinced him, that they were not wholly destitute of sterling courage. There might be some ground for punishing the person, whose case produced the remonstrance; but the punishment should have been under the direction of a civil and not a military officer, and of another kind; for, though it may be deemed a retaliation upon the country, it has tended greatly to irritate.

The Massachusetts congress were solicitous to keep their proceedings from coming to the knowledge of general Gage; but from several circumstances which occurred, they entertained a strong suspicion, that they had some one among them, who betrayed their counsels. A gentleman, who is not a stranger to many considerable defects in the moral and political character of Dr. Church, is apprehensive that he is the person; but is exceedingly curious of mentioning his suspicion, considering the high reputation in which the doctor is among the sons of liberty.

[March 30.] General Gage marched out about eleven hundred men into the country; who, doing much damage by throwing down the flone fences, occasioned a committee's waiting upon the Massachusetts congress on the Saturday, when upon the point of adjourning; which kept them sitting till they received on the Monday following, accounts by a vessel from Falmouth of what parliament had done and was doing, in relation to their colony.

It was a providential circumstance that they had so early intelligence, and obtained it before general Gage had received his dispatches: they were careful to improve it. The intelligence spread fast, and induced more of the inhabitants of Boston to remove out of the town. A number had been for some time withdrawing themselves. The town was liable to be converted instantly, at the discretion of the governor, into a secure prison; and the people of it might be held as hostages for the conduct of the province at large, or be kidnapped and fent to England, to stand trial for supposed offences. Continuance in it was hazardous to many, who had diffinguished themselves by taking an active part against the measures of government. But the dauntless courage of some such inclined them to remain, though there was no knowing what private orders might be fent to general Gage; who was not inattentive to the fervice in which he was employed, while he evidenced a prevailing defire after a peaceable accommodation.

commodation. He fent private orders to the commanding officer at New-York, to purchase up all the duck, blankets, pick-axes, pots, and other articles proper for camp service. Application was made by the officer to the Philadelphia merchants, who penetrated the design, and no less nobly than unanimously resusted a compliance, Three of the New-York merchants had for some time been buying up, selling and sending the several articles to Boston; but at length a stop was put to their proceedings by the influence of captain Sears, who, upon his return from Philadelphia, urged that they might want those things themselves, and made a considerable stir upon the occasion. But a great number were purchased at Portsmouth, before the discovery of the general's intention.

The news of the parliamentary proceedings encouraged the foldiery to infult the people more than ever: their conduct feemingly intimated, that they meant to provoke the other to begin a quarrel; while these bore all with patience, as they were determined not to be the aggressors. Nothing was wanting, but a spark to set the whole continent in a slame. The important moment, big with inconceivable consequences was evidently approaching, when, through accident or design, it would be applied to those combustibles, which had been long collecting.

The grenadier and light infantry companies were taken off duty, upon the plea of learning a new exercife, which made the Bostonians jealous, that there was some scheme on foot. A daughter of liberty, unequally yoked in point of politics, sent word, by a trusty hand, to Mr. Samuel Adams, residing in company with Mr. Hancock, at Lexington, about thirteen miles from Charlestown, that the troops were coming out in a few days. Upon this their friends at Boston were advised to move out their plate, &c. and the committee of safety voted, "that all the ammunition be deposited in nine different towns; and that other articles be lodged, some in one place, some in another, so as to the 15 medicinal chests, 2000 iron pots, 2000 bowls, 15,000 canteens, and 1100 tents; and that the six companies of matrosses be stationed in different towns."

Mr. Adams inferred from the number to be employed, that these were the objects, and not himself and Mr. Hancock, who might be more easily seized in a private way by a few armed individuals, than by a large body of troops that must march, for miles together, under the eye of the public.

The provincial flores had been hitherto deposited at Worcester and Concord. To the last of these places, but half the distance of the other from Boston, the general turned his attention; and, being continually pestered by the repeated solicitations of the American tories, with whom he was furrounded, and who perfuaded him there was no danger of refillance, their whig countrymen being too cowardly, he determined, without the advice of the council, when and in what way to attempt the feizure of the many flores supposed to be in the place.

Vol. I. S s rican

[April 18.] A number of officers dined together at Cambridge, and toward night scattered themselves upon the road leading to Concord; and took their station so as to be ready to intercept any expresses going from Boston to alarm and raise the country, with intelligence of the troops being upon their march. When the corps was nearly ready to proceed upon the expedition, Dr. Warren, by a mere accident, had notice of it just in time to fend messengers over the neck and across the ferry, on to Lexington, before the orders for preventing every person's quitting the town were executed. The officers intercepted feveral, but fome being well mounted, escaped their vigilance; and the alarm, being once given, spread apace, by the ringing of bells, and the firing of fignal guns and vollies. By eleven at night, cight hundred grenadiers and light infantry, the flower of the army, embarked at the common, proceeded and landed at Phipps's farm, from whence they marched for Concord, under the comanand of lieutenant-colonel Smith, aided by major Pitcairn, who

[April 19.] About two in the morning, the Lexington company of militia, to the amount of one hundred and thirty, repaired to the green, close in with the meeting-house. The air being chilly, and the intelligence refpecting the regulars fomewhat uncertain, the men, after the roll-call, were difmiffed, with orders to appear again at beat of drum. Some went home, others to the adjoining public house. Word being brought between four and five, that the troops were not far off, they that were at hand collected, to the number of about feventy, by the time the regulars made their appearance. They were mossly in a confufed state, and a few only were drawn up. There were present at the time about forty spectators without arms. The milita were too few to think of beginning an attack. But major Pitcairn rode round the meeting (as the meeting-house is generally called) and approaching them called out, "Disperse you rebels, throw down your arms and disperse." An instant compliance not taking place, which he might construe into contempt, he rode a little further, fired his piffol, flourished his sword, and ordered the foldiers to fire, with which they complied, huzzaing upon the occasion. This produced an immediate dispersion; but the firing was continued. Individuals finding they were fired upon though dispersing, had spirit enough to stop and return the fire.

Three or four were killed upon the green; the rest, making the whole number of the flain eight, were shot on the other side of the walls and fences, over which they had fled in order to escape. During this interesting period, Messrs. S. Adams and Hancock, whose residence was near at hand, quitted and removed to a further distance. While walking along, Mr. Adams exclaimed, "O! what a glorious morning is this!" in the belief that it would eventually liberate the colony from all subjection to Great-Britain. His companion did not penetrate his meaning, and thought the allusion was only to the aspect of the sky. Lest it should be faid and believed, that the meeting was crowded with militia, before and during the fire, let me mention that there were only a man and a boy in it. The detachment marched on to Concord. The people of the town, having received the alarm, drew up in order for defence; but observing that the regulars were too numerous, retired over the north bridge and waited for reinforcements from the neighbouring towns. A party of light infantry followed, and possessed themselves of the bridge, while the main body entered the town, and proceeded to execute their commission. They disabled two twenty-four pounders, and destroyed their carriages and seven wheels for the same, with their limbers, beside sixteen wheels for brafs three pounders, and two carriages with limber and wheels for two four pounders. They threw 500lb. of ball into the river, wells, and other places; and broke in pieces about fixty barrels of flour, half of which was faved. These were all the stores that they could discover and destroy, on the account of which a civil war has commenced between the colonies and the parent state. The inhabitants of Britain may see reason, for many ages, to curfe the memory of the man or men, who has or have been at the foundation of this fatal catastrophe, should they ever be known. The militia being reinforced, Mr. John Butterick, of Concord, major of a minute regiment, and who commanded, ordered the men not to give the first fire, that so the provincials might not be the aggressors, for he was ignorant of what had paffed at Lexington. Upon his advancing with them, the light infantry retired to the Concord fide of the river, and began pulling up the bridge; and on his approaching nearer, immediately fired and killed captain Isaac Davis, of Acton, (who with his company of minute men made the front) and one of the The fire was returned, a skirmish ensued, and the troops were forced to retreat, having feveral men killed and wounded, and lieutenant Gould (who would have been killed, had not a minister present prevented) with some others taken. One of their wounded, who was left behind, attempting to get up, was affaulted by a young fellow going after the purfuers to join them, who, not being under the feelings of humanity, barbaroufly broke his skull with a small hatchet and let out his brains, but neither scalped him nor cut off his ears. This event may give rise to fome malevolent pen to write, that many of the killed and wounded at Lexington, were not only fcalped, but had their eyes forced out of the fockets by the fantatics of New-England: not one was fo treated either there or at Concord. You have the real fact. The poor object languished for an hour or two before he ex-

The party was joined by the main body; and the whole detachment retreated with the utmost expedition; for all the country was now up in arms, and attacked the troops on every quarter. In their march of fix miles back to Lexington, they were exceedingly annoyed, not only by those who pressed upon their rear; but by others, who fired upon them from behind the Hone walls and other coverts, which supplied the place of lines and redoubts to the provincials. At Lexington they were joined by a detachment under Lord Percy.

The news of what had happened at Lexington in their way to Concord, flew to Boston and the neighbourhood. But the flaughter of the militia men was carefully concealed from general Gage, who was not made acquainted with it till late in the afternoon. He had however, early intelligence of the rifing of the country; and therefore detached, about eight in the morning, Lord Percy with 16 companies of foot, and a number of marines, goo men in the whole, and two pieces of cannon, to fupport colonel Smith. The brigade marched out, playing, by way of contempt, Yankee Doodle, a fong composed in derision of the New-Englanders, scornfully called Yankees. A smart boy observing it as the troops passed through Roxbury, made himself extremely merry with the circumstance, jumping and laughing, so as to attract the notice of his lordship, who, it is faid, asked him at what he was laughing so heartily; and was answered, "To think how you will dance by and by to Chevy Chace." It is added, that the repartee fluck by his lordship the whole day.

You may wish to know the origin of the term Yankee. Take the best account of it which your friend can procure. It was a cant, favorite word with farmer Jonathan Hastings, of Cambridge, about 1713. Two aged ministers, who were at the college in that town, have told me, they remembered it to have been then in use among the sludents, but had no recollection of it before that period. The inventor used it to express excellency. A Yankee good horse, or Yankee cider and the like, were an excellent good horse and excellent cider. The students used to hire horses of hun; their intercourse with him, and his use of the term upon all occasions, led them to adopt it, and they gave him the name of Yankee Jon. He was a worthy honest man, but no conjurer. This could not escape the notice of the collegiates. Yankee probably became a by-word among them to express a weak, simple, awkward person; was carried from the college with them when they left it, and was in that way circulated and established through the country (as was the case in respect to Hob-son's choice*, by the students at Cambridge, in Old-England) till from its currency in New-England, it was at length taken up and unjustly applied to the New-Englanders in common, as a term of reproach.

The junction of the brigade under Lord Percy, with the detachment under colonel Smith, gave the last a breathing time, especially as they now had cannon, which awed the provincials from preffing upon the rear in a direct line. But the whole force ventured not to halt long; for far and wide the minute-men and militia were collecting, in order to cut off their retreat to Boston. They foon renewed their march; constant skirmishing succeeded, and a continued fire, though often irregular and fcattering on their fide, as well as on the part of the provincials. The close firing from behind the walls, by good markfmen, for fuch were almost all the provincials, put the troops into no small confusion. and made it so dangerous for the officers, that they were more attentive to their fatety than in common. Major Pitcairn quitted his horse, which was taken with the pistols in the holsters. The foldiers loaded and fired over the stone walls, when there was not a fingle man behind them. They were incommoded by the wind's blowing the fmoke strongly back upon them all the time they were retreating; during which they burnt fome houses. attempted others, and plundered many of every thing valuable, destroying what they could not carry off. They killed several innocent unarmed persons; and murdered two old men at Me-Before they reached this place, a few Americans, headed by the Rev. Mr. Payson of Chelsea, who till now had been extremely moderate, attacked a party of twelve foldiers carrying stores to the retreating troops, killed one, wounded feveral, made the whole prisoners, and gained possession of their arms and flores, without any lofs whatever to themselves. regulars, when near Cambridge, were upon the point of taking a wrong road, which would have led them into the most imminent danger, but were prevented by the direction of a young gentleman residing at the college; by which mean they made good their retreat a lutle after funfet over Charlestown neck to Bunker's-Hill, but spent and wore down by the excessive fatigues they had undergone, having marched that day between thirty and forty miles. Here they remained fecure till the next day, when they crossed at Charlestown ferry and returned to

Lieutenant-colonel Smith was much displeased with the soldiers firing at Lexington; probably general Gage had given orders that they should not fire unless they were first fired upon. Major Pitcairn undoubtedly directed them to fire from the mistaken apprehension he had entertained of American resolution, for he has the character of a good tempered officer. There were never more than about four hundred provincials together, attacking at one and the same time; and often scarce that number. But as fome tired and gave out, others came up. They had very little appearance of discipline. Privates and officers fired away they had opportunity of doing execution, without waiting for the word of command; and used their knowledge of the country, to gain the opportunity, by croffing fields and fences, of acting as flanking parties against the regulars while these proceeded along the road. Colonel Pickering of Salem, had the command of a fine well exercised provincial regiment; had he pushed on with his men, fo as to have headed the British before they had gained Charlestown neck, (and he was near enough) they must have clubbed their firelocks, for they were quite wearied out with the fervices of the day, and had but a round or two of aminunition remaining. No fatisfactory reason has been assigned for the want of greater alertness in colonel Pickering's regiment. British officers are assonished, chagrined and mortified beyond measure at what has happened. It's death to all their glorying, their best troops have been obliged in this manner to flee before a number of Yankees, "when all the officers in general did every thing that men could do, and when the foldiers behaved with their usual intrepidity *." They are fore at heart upon the oc-They have had 1 lieutenant killed, 2 lieutenant-colonels wounded, Smith is one, 2 captains and 9 lieutenants wounded, 1 lieutenant missing, 2 ensigns wounded, 1 sergeant killed, 7 wounded, 2 missing, 1 drummer killed, 1 wounded, 62 rank and file killed, and 157 wounded; in all 65 killed, 180 wounded, and 28 made prisoners; total 273.

Of the provincials 50 have been killed, 34 wounded, and 4 are missing; in all 88. The following officers and gentlemen are of the number, viz. justice Isaac Gardner of Brookline, capt. Isaac Davis of Acton, capt. Jonathan Wilson of Bedford, lieut. John Bacon, and fergeant Elisha Mills of Needham, and Deacon Josian Haynes of Sudbury killed; capt. Eleazer Kingsbury of Needham, capt. Samuel Williams of Cambridge, captains Charles Miles, Nathaniel Barret, and George Minot of Concord, capt. Oliver Barnes, and deacon Aaron Chamberlain, of Chelmsford wounded. The perfons who have fallen are regretted with the deepest concern, and are honoured not only as patriots, but as martyrs, who have died bravely in the cause of their country.

Captains John Ford and Oliver Barron, and deacon Davis, all of Chelmsford, diffinguished themselves in the course of the day. It can be fully proved that captain Ford killed five regulars.— James Howard, a private in the Acton company, and a regular coming out of a house, caught sight of each other, and discharged their pieces at the same instant; both shots taking effect, the last dropt down dead, and the first expired a few hours after. A big boy joined in the chace of the retreating troops, and was very expert in firing at them, at length a ball from the enemy grazed his head, and produced a sless would be should up his head with a handkerchief, and renewed his pursuit.

Two British officers who have been taken, and the privates, who are wounded and prisoners, are treated with humanity by the provincials; and general Cage may, if he pleases, safely send his furgeons to drefs and attend them.

If the contest is to become general between the colonies and the mother country, it may be deemed a happiness for them that it has commenced in the Massachusetts, where all the inhabitants are so connected with each other by descent, blood, uniformity of manners, similarity of religious and civil sentiments, mediocrity of circumstances, and a general equality, that the killing of a single individual interestent the whole province, in the event, and makes them consider it as a common cause.

The inhabitants are now every where in arms; and collecting in such numbers about Boston, that they will not only invest the town effectually, but excite disagreeable apprehensions in general Gage. No one is suffered to go in or out at present. The provincials have for their commander in chief, a native of the Massachusetts, general Ward; the honorable Jedediah Prebble having, more than a month ago, declined on account of his bad health. General Ward might have pleaded the like excuse, but he wishes to serve his country to the utmost of his abilities, and is ready to risk his life in the cause of American liberty. He is to be trusted, being a gentleman of great integrity. His commission as commander in chief of the Bay troops was delivered to days after, they chose general John Thomas lieutenant general. The day general Ward received his commission, the committee of fafety fent letters to New-Hampshire and Connecticut. with an account of the enemy's proceedings the day before, and praying all the affishance in their power. The next day they agreed upon inlifting 8000 men out of the Massachusetts forces: but the provincial congress being adjourned from Concord to Watertown, resolved the succeeding day, " that an army of 30,000 men be immediately raised and established; that 12,600 be by this province; and that a letter and delegate be fent to the feveral colonies of Hampshire, Connecticut and Rhode-Island." Head quarters are at Cambridge; and the students quit the college that the provincials may be accommodated. General Thomas commands at Roxbury. He is a cool, courageous, difcerning, and active officer, well qualified for guarding the important post he occupies, and preventing the enemy's making a fally over the neck into the country, should they be inclined to attempt it: but for the present they are more afraid of being attacked.

General Gage, to fecure the people within from taking up arms against the king's troops, in case of an assault, has agreed with the committee of the town, [April 22.] after a long conference, that, upon the inhabitants in general lodging their arms in Faneuil-hall, or any other convenient place, under the care of the felectmen, all fuch inhabitants as are inclined may depart from the town with their families and effects; that those who remain may depend upon his protection; and that the arms aforefaid, at a fuitable time, shall be returned to the owners. town agreed to this propofal, and their vote upon it was read by the committee, upon their return to his excellency, who accepted it; and further agreed, that the inhabitants may remove, from town by land and water with their effects, within the limits specified by the port-act. He also informed the committee, that he would defire the admiral to lend his boats to facilitate the removal of the effects of the inhabitants; and that he would allow carriages to pass and repass for that purpose. He said likewise, that he would take care that the poor, who may remain in town, shall not suffer for want of provisions after their own stock is expended; and defired that a letter might be written to Dr. Warren, chairman of the committee of congress, that those persons in the country, who may incline to remove into Boston with their effects, may have liberty fo to do without molestation.-An account of these proceedings was sent to Dr. Warren; who was further informed by the town committee, [April 25.] "Permission will be given for 30 waggons to enter the town at once, to carry away the effects of the inhabitants; so soon as those have returned to the end of the causeway leading to Roxbury, then others will be permitted to come in. None will be permitted to enter till after sun rife, nor remain after sun set. If any vessel or boat now in the harbour be employed to remove the inhabitants effects, security must be given that it be returned. It is expected, that leave be obtained for some persons to go to the different parishes to give notice to such persons who incline to come with their effects into Boston, that they may come without molestation; and it is defired, that the waggons and vessels employed to come to carry away the goods of the inhabitants of Boston, may bring the effects of those who are desirous to leave the country, they paying half the charge."

[April, 26.] Doctor Warren has this day written to general

Gage,

"SIR,

THE unhappy fituation into which this colony is thrown, gives the greatest uneasiness to every man, who regards the welfare of the empire, or feels for the distresses of his tellow men: but even now much may be done to alleviate those missortunes which cannot be entirely remedied, and I think it of the utmost importance to us, that our conduct be such, as that the contending parties may entirely rely upon the honor and integrity of each other, for the punctual performance of any agreement that shall be made between them. Your excellency, I believe. knows very well the part I have taken in public affairs. I ever fcorned difguife. I think I have done my duty; fome may think otherwise: but be affured, Sir, as far as my influence goes, every thing, which can reasonably be required of us to do, shall be done; and every thing promifed shall be religiously performed. I fould now be very glad to know from you, Sir, how many days you defire may be allowed for fuch as defire to remove to Boston with their essects, and what time you will allow the neople in Boston for their removal. When I have received the information, I will repair to congress, and hasten as far as I am able the issuing a proclamation. I beg leave to suggest, that the condition of admitting only thirty waggons at a time into the town, appears to me very inconvenient, and will prevent the good effects of a proclamation intended to be iffued for encouraging all waggoners to allist in removing the effects from Boston with all possible speed. If your excellency will be pleased to take the matter into confideration, and favour me as foon as may be with an answer, it will lav me under a great obligation, as it VOL. I.

fo nearly concerns the welfare of my friends in Boston. I have many things which I wish to say to your excellency, and most sincerely wish I had broken through the formalities which I thought due to your rank, and freely had told you all I knew or thought of public affairs, and I must ever consess, whatever may be the event, that you generously gave me such opening as I now think I ought to have embraced; but the true cause of my not doing it, was the knowledge I had of the vileness and treachery of many persons around you, who I suppose had gained your entire confidence.

I am, &c. &c."

The committee of fafety have fent fetters to Rhode-Island and Connecticut, importuning immediate affishance; and that as large a number of troops as can be spired, may be immediately marched forward, well slocked with provisions and ammunition, and accompanied with as large a train of artillery as can be granted. They express their determination, at all events, to act their parts with firmness and intrepidity, knowing that slavery is far worse than death.

The committee appointed to examine into the damages done on the 19th at Cambridge, Lexington and Concord, have reported that by fire, robbery and defiruction, the same are as follows: at Cambridge 901l. 16s. 5d. 1-4; at Lexington 132cl. 16s. cd. 3-4; and at Concord 2c6l. 2s. 5d. 1-4; in all 2428l. 14s. 11d. 1-4 sterling. The parties exhibited their accounts on oath, and the greatest care was taken, that the state of the dama-

My friend Quincy has facrificed his life for the fake of his country. The ship in which he failed, arrived at Cape-Anne within these two days; but he lived not to get on shore, or to hear and triumph at the account of the success of the Lexington engagement. His remains will be honorably interred by his relations. Let him be numbered with the patriotic heroes who fall in the cause of liberty; and his memory be dear to posserity.—Let his only surviving child, a son of about three years, live to possess his noble virtues, and to transmit his name down to suture generations. You have my warmest ack nowledgments for your last manuscript. See that you embrace every safe opportunity of continuing your correspondence; you will find me in that line of conduct.

The supreme power now extant in the Massachusetts has given their first naval commission to captain John Derby of Salem, who is intrusted by the provincial congress with dispatches for Dr. Franklin, containing an account of the Lexington fight, and an address to the inhabitants of Great-Britain. He fails without delay. In the address the congress profess to place much dependence on the honor, wisdom and valour of Britons, from which they hope for their interference in preventing the profecution of present measures. They make great protessions of loyalty; but declare, that they will not tamely submit to the perfecution and tyranny of a cruel ministry; and that they are determined to die or be free. They appeal to Heaven for the justice of their cause. Should not an accommodation take place, Heaven must grant them its special protection, or they well be crushed before the power of Britain, notwithstanding all that the other colonies can do for them; unless the officers, who are employed against them, are not supplied with an adequate force, or are wreichedly defective in courage, inclination, activity, prudence, or other military abilities: or unless some foreign power, for its own interest and to injure the parent state, takes them by the hand .-Their military flores are scarce worth mentioning. They reckon upon fixteen field pieces. It is well if fix of them are calculated for much actual service. There are four brass ones, of a fmall fize, that may answer a good purpose. They have a few large iron cannon, two or three mortars and howitzers, cannon ball, and shells; but they have only eighty-two half barrels of powder belonging to the public flore; most towns have a small quantity, that however will be foon exhausted. Considering what ought to be the case, to warrant a reasonable expectation of fuccels, in a military contest with a nation that abounds in all the apparatus of war, they may be pronounced deflitute of every article but men; and, though thefe are not wanting in natural courage, it will take a confiderable time to make them thorough good foldiers. They have neither money nor magazines.

LETTER XIII.

London, June 12, 1775.

HE restraining and fishery bill did not pass through the house of lords with less opposition than what it had met with in the house of commons. Upon the motion for committing ting it after the fecond reading, the marquis of Rockingham opposed it with great ability; and in the course of his speech showed, that in 1704, the whole amount of the exports to the New-England colonies was only about 70,000l. annually; that in 1754 it had arisen to 180,000l. in the succeeding ten years to 300,000l. and in the last ten years had nearly doubled that sum.

The bill was carried by a majority of more than three to one; but was productive of a protest, figned by fixteen lords. It is particularly diffinguished, by the fevere censure passed upon a lord high in office, who in the late debates, most unadvisedly threw out a charge of general cowardice against the Americans,

The fishery bill had scarce cleared the house of commons, when lord North brought in another, [March 9.] "To restrain the trade and commerce of the colonies of New-Jersey, Penn-fylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and South-Carolina, to Great-Britain, Ireland, and the British islands in the West-Indies, under certain conditions and limitations." While this bill was in agitation, a long feries of evidence, in behalf of the West-India merchants and planters, was laid before the house. It appeared, that upon a very moderate computation, the capital in the West-India islands, confishing of lands, buildings, negroes, and stock of all kinds, did not amount to less than 60,000,000l. sterling; that their exports of late years to Britain, ran to about 190,000 hogsheads and puncheons of fugar and rum annually; amounting in weight to 95,000 tons, and in value about 4,000,000l. exclusive of a great number of smaller articles, and of their very great export to North-America; that their growth was fo rapid, and improvement fo great, that within a few years, their export of fugar to this kingdom was increased 40,000 hogsheads annually, amounting to about 800,000l in value. The probability was apparent, that more than half of the capital of 60,000,000l. was either the immediate property of persons resident in this country, or owing to thein; and also that the revenue gained above 700,000l. a year upon the direct West-India trade, exclufive of its eventual and circuitous products, and of the African trade.

[March 20.] Mr. Burke made a number of conciliatory propositions with respect to the colonies, contained in a set of refolutions, which he accompanied and elucidated by a celebrated speech. He traced that unconquerable spirit of freedom, that violent passion for liberty, by which the colonists are distinguished from all other people of the world, from the fources of their descent, education, manners, religious principles, forms of government, and distance from the head of the empire.-He made it appear, that the whole exports to North-America, the West-Indies and Africa, in 1704, (from England it must be, for the union of the two kingdoms had not then taken place) amounted only in value to 569,930l. but the comparative value of money at that period was much greater than at present. In 1772, the exports from Great-Britain to the fame places, amounted at a medium, to no less than 6,024,1711. He also showed, that the whole export trade of England, including that to the colonies, amounted in 1704, only to 6,509,000l. Thus the trade to the colonies alone was in 1772, within less than half a million of being equal to what was carried on by England with the whole world, at the beginning of the prefent century. However aftonithing this general increase of the whole colonies may appear, the growth of the province of Pennsylvania is still more extraordinary. In 1704 the whole exports to that colony amounted to no more than 11,459l. and in 1772, they were rifen to 507,909l: being nearly fifty times the original demand, and almost equal to the whole colony export at the first period. This aftonishing growth of the colonies, within little more than half a century, and the prodigious share they contribute to our greatness, makes them a matter of the first importance to ourselves, and must excite the admiration of future ages.

The previous question was moved on the first proposition, and carried by 270 to 78: and thus ended the business.

But the ill fuccess which has attended all conciliatory propositions hitherto, excepting those which have originated from government, did not deter Mr. Hartley from making a similar attempt. [April 27.] The motion however was rejected without a division.

During the progress of the second restraining bill, an additional clause was moved for by the minister; whereby the counties of Newcastle, Kent and Sussex on the Delaware, were included in the prohibitions of that bill, and carried without a division.

While these matters were transacting, several petitions were received from manufacturing towns in Britain and Ireland against the coercive acts. Some counter-petitions were also received, calling for an enforcement of the laws of Britain, as the only means of preserving a trade with the colonies. Much altercation arose on the truth of facts alledged on both sides, as well as on the manner of obtaining the signatures and the quality of those who signed. The minority insisted, that the most who signed the war-petitions, as they called them, were persons who had little or no interest in the American trade, but of that description of warm and active party-men commonly called tories. And they entered into several examinations to prove the truth of the former part of their affertion. This produced many long and hot debates. Other petitions were presented to the crown, and equally difregarded: one from the British fettlers in Canada against the Quebec bill; one from the quakers, in which besides endeavouring to diffuse the influence of that spirit of peace, which is the predominant principle in their religious system, they declared themselves persuaded, that there are not in his majesty's extensive dominions, subjects more loyal, and more zealously attached to his royal person, his family and government, than in the provinces of America, among all religious denominations.-His majesty however, went in person to the house, and gave the royal affent to the restraining and fishery bill in the usual form. In this feafon of public discontent, when the minds of all were agitated on one side or other, the city of London, not discouraged by the fate of all its applications for a number of years palt, once more approached the throne, with an address, remonstrance and petition, [April 10.] upon a fubject, and in a manner, as little calculated to obtain a favourable reception as any of the preceding. In this remonstrance they recapitulated the whole catalogue of American grievances; declared their abhorrence of the meafurers which had been purfued, and were then purfuing; and justified the resistance to which the Americans had been driven, upon the great principles of the conflitution; " actuated by which," they faid," at the glorious period of the revolution, our ancestors transferred the imperial crown of these realms to the illustrious house of Brunswick." They beseeched his majesty immediately and for ever to difmifs from his councils, those ministers and advisers, who had been at the bottom of the preceding measures. His majesty delivered the following answer, "It is with the utmost assonishment, that I find any of my subjects capable of encouraging the rebellious disposition, which unhappily exists in my colonies in North-America. Having entire confidence in the wifdom of my parliament, the great council of the nation, I will fleadily purfue those measures which they have recommended for the support of the constitutional rights of Great-Britain, and the protection of the commercial lights of my kingdom."

The earl of Effingham has uniformly opposed the whole system of measures pursued against the Americans; and finding that the regiment in which he served was at length destined for America, and thinking it inconsistent with his character, and beneath his dignity, to enforce measures with his sword, which he had so utterly condemned in his legislative capacity, [March 12.] he wrote a letter of resignation to the secretary of war. In it he deeply regretted his being necessitated to quit the military profession;

but faid, "I cannot, without reproach from my own conscience, consent to bear arms against my fellow subjects in America, in what, to my discernment, is not a clear cause." Pity that it is not a point of honor with all military officers, to consider the merits of the cause wherein their swords are to be employed, and when they are not fatisfied in their own judgments, to practise as the noble earl has done. Such a point of honor might hinder many a war.

The British ambassador at the Hague, applied to the states to forbid their subjects supplying the Americans with arms, ammunition, gunpowder, &c. and they by proclamation prohibited the exportation of all fuch articles, in Dutch or foreign ships, from any of their dominions, without licence, on penalty of forfeiting about 901. sterling. Judge, whether the profits of the voyage will not be fo great as to make it worth the merchants while to run the risk of that sum. Let the American vessels repair to Holland, and the Dutch will furnish them with gunpowder in large glass bottles of several gallons dimension, under the notion of spirits or liquor of one kind or other *. France was also applied to, and could have crushed all affistance, by express prohibition; but only told her subjects, that if they afforded anv, it was at their own risk, tantamount to-if you will venture you Spain roundly refused giving the least hindrance to her fubiects.

[March 13.] His majesty went to the house of peers, and gave the royal affent to the bill for restraining the trade of New-Jersey, Pennsylvania, &c. Thus the probability of the colonies dividing from each other is lessened, and their union becomes more established. Some future proceedings in the provinces of New-York and North-Carolina, will be likely to consolidate the whole continent.

The American fisheries being now abolished, measures were necessary to supply their place, and to guard against the consequences of the foreign markets, either changing the course of consumption, or falling into the hands of strangers. It was also expedient to pay a greater attention to the interests of Ireland, than what had been practised for many years. The minister therefore moved for a committee of the whole house [Mar. 27.] to consider of the encouragement proper to be given to the fisheries of Britain and Ireland. The committee in its progress, granted several bounties to the ships of Britain and Ireland, for their encouragement in profecuting the Newsoundland fishery; and two resolutions were introduced and passed in favor of the latter kingdom. Complaints however were made, that clauses were infidiously stolen into the act to prevent its operating in any confiderable extent. The committee agreed also to the granting of bounties for encouraging the whale sishery, and to take off the duties payable upon the importation of oil, blubber, and bone from Newfoundland, &c. and on the importation of seal skins.

Ministry have not confined themselves to the making of laws; they have also sent out against the Americans, generals Howe, Clinton and Burgoyne, in the Cerberus. [Mar. 28.] The transports with troops to re-ensorce governor Gage, sailed a week after from Cork.

[May 15.] Toward the close of the fession, Mr. Burke acquainted the house, with his having received a paper of great importance from the general affembly of New-York. He observed. that it was a complaint, in the form of a remonstrance, of several acts of parliament, some of which they affirmed, had established principles, and others had made regulations, subversive of the rights of English subjects. He afterward moved, that it might be brought up. The minister immediately moved an amendment, which proved an indirect but effectual negative upon Mr. Burke's motion. The amendment was carried by a majority of 186 to 67; the question being then put upon the amended motion, it was rejected without a division. The New-York memorial to the lords was brought in by the duke of Manchester, who moved for its being read. After some altercation the question was called for, and upon a division the motion was rejected by a majority of 45 against 25. The petition to the king was received, but the prayer of the petitioners was not granted. Such is the fate of the applications made by the general affembly of New-York, for a redrefs of their supposed grievances. It must tend to widen the breach between Britain and the colonies.

[May 17.] Lord Camden presented a petition to the house of sords from the British inhabitants of the province of Quebec, in which they stated their grievances, and implored their lordships favorable interposition, that the Quebec act might be repealed or amended, and that they might enjoy their constitutional rights, privileges, and franchises. His lordship, after expatiating on the evils of the act, proposed a bill, which was read, for the repeal of the late act. This measure was strongly opposed by administration, and a motion was made by lord Dartmouth, that the bill be rejected, which was carried by a majority of fixty out of eighty-eight, there being only twenty-eight lords who supported the bill. Much censure having been expressed or implied, both within doors and without, relative to the whole conduct of the bishops in the Canada transactions, the reverend father of that bench, stood up during the debate to justify the Quebec act, so far as it related to religious matters, which he did upon the principles of toleration, the faith of the capitulation, and the terms of the definitive treaty of peace; but many were far from being convinced, that these principles required such a full and perfect establishment of the popish religion, as is granted by the act itself.

[May 18.] Sir George Saville prefented to the house of commons, another petition from the same inhabitants of Quebec, in which, among other things, they represented with too much truth, that the petition to his majefly, in the name of all the French inhabitants of that province, and upon which the late law had been avowedly founded, was not fairly obtained, and had neither received the concurrence of the people in general, nor even been communicated to them, but had been carried about in a feeret manner, and figned by a few of the nobleffe, advocates, and others, who were in their confidence. They affirmed that the inhabitants in general were as much alarmed as thenselves, at the introduction of the Canadian laws. They concluded by praying, that the faid act might be repealed or amended. Sir George examined and laid open the weak or obnoxious parts of the act, and threw new light even upon those which had already undergone the highest degree of colouring, and then concluded his speech with moving for a repeal of the late act for the better government of the province of Quebec. Confiderable debates enfired, in the course of which the minister avowed his intention, if it should become necessary, of arming the Canadians against the other colonics. But he declared his firm perfuafion, that the troubles in America, would be speedily and happily settled without blood-shed. Notwithstanding this declaration it was whifpered, that he was uneafy, and from what general Gage wrote last, dreaded the news by the April packet. For some, who professed to have the best information, afferted that orders were fent to apprehend Messrs. Cushing, Samuel Adams, Hancock and others, and to transport them to Great-Britain; and that the receipt of these orders had been acknowledged; but that fecond orders had been dispatched to hang them at Boston. Sir George Saville's motion was rejected by a majority of more than two to one, the numbers being 174 to 86.

[May 26.] The speaker, when he presented the money bills for the royal assent, gave an affurance in his speech to his majesty, that if the Americans persisted in their resolutions, and the sword must be drawn, the commons would do every thing in their power to maintain and support the supremacy of this legistration.

The king gave his royal affent to the feveral bills, both public and private, which remained to be paffed into acts; and clofeed the fession by a speech from the throne, in which he expressed the most perfect satisfaction in the conduct of the parliament, during the course of their session; and his persuasion, that the most salutary effects must, in the end, result from measures formed and conducted on such principles, as those on which they had acted. A favorable representation was made of the pacific disposition of other powers, and the usual assurance given of endeavouring to secure the public tranquility.

[May 28.] Captain Derby arrived with his difpatches for Dr. Franklin, got to London in the evening, and delivered them to Dr. Lee, as the other agent had left the country. The circulated accounts of the action were vague; it was plain however; that the troops had been worsted; and that government feared it; though they disclaimed all knowledge of what had happened.

The Sukey, captain Brown, though the failed four days before captain Derby's veffel, did not arrive till the ninth of June with general Gage's dispatches. The Gazette has given us the governmental account of the Lexington engagement. From the praises bellowed upon officers and men for their activity and bravery, it is evident, that the Americans made the business of the day a hard, disficult and dangerous service to them. The nation in general is not so shocked with this transaction, as the importance of it requires. It was a fatal mistake to send soldiers instead of shipping; and no less so to order them to Boston, instead of planting them in New-York (where government has a strong interest) and securing a fortisted line of communication from thence to Canada, with which to divide the southern from the New-England colonies.

Six more regiments of foot have received orders to hold themfelves in readiness to embark for America. They are encouraged by an expectation, into which they are drawn by the informations given them, of possessing farms and other confiscated property.

MY DEAR SIR,

TO prevent an omiffion, let me begin with mentioning, that when governor Martin met the general affembly of North-Carolina, at Newbern, [April 4, 1775.] he made a speech to them in a high governmental strain; and expressed his expectation, that they would oppose so dangerous a flep, as the unwarrantable measure of appointing delegates to attend a congress in Philadelphia. He also told them, that they were most peculiarly called upon to oppose a meeting of delegates, which the people had been invited to choose, and who were appointed to assemble at that very time and place, in the face of the legislature. The affembly in their answer justified the meeting of the people, and faid, "Be it far from us even to wish to prevent the operations of the convention, now held at Newbern." They also took the opportunity, the first that had been given them, to express their warm attachment to their filler colonies in general, and their heart-felt compassion for the deplorable state of the town of Boston; and to declare the fixed resolution of the colony, to unite with the other colonies in every effort to retain their just rights and liberties.

Let me now enter upon the narration of the effects of the Lexington engagement out of the Malfachusetts colony. The news of it flew with the utmost rapidity; and influenced the minds of all people, answerable to their various apprehensions and attachments.

Col. Putnam ferved with the Connecticut troops, under gen. Amherst the last war. By his courage and conduct he secured to himself a good share of reputation. When peace commenced, he returned to the civil line of life. Of late he has occupied a tavern with a farm annexed to it. Such a junction is frequent in New-England, and the occupation not at all inconsistent with a Roman character. The Lexington news was brought him while working in a leathern frock and apron, at a stone wall, with which to sence in his land. This was about eleven o'clock in the morning. After giving his men some direction how to proceed, he went home, got his horse, and rode to the neighbouring towns, to acquaint the militia officers and others with what had taken place. As he was returning, he found some hundreds mustered, who informed him that they had appointed him their general, and were determined to march off immediately. He faid that he was not ready, had no money about him, and must go and get fome. They supplied him from among themselves; on which he gave proper orders for their marching after him, and went forward in his check shirt, upon the same beast, and got to Concord the next morning by sun rise, having rode, as he supposed, from eleven o'clock of the preceding morning, not less than a hundred miles, within the eighteen hours. The militia that followed him, marched with a quick step till they reached the place of destination.

Mr. Benedict Arnold of New-Haven, had been chosen captain of a volunteer company, by the inhabitants, when they began to prepare for whatever might happen. No fooner did the Lexington news reach him, than he called his company together, and asked them whether they would march off with him the next morning for the neighbourhood of Boston, distant 150 miles .-They agreed; and at the proper time paraded before the tavern where a committee was fitting. He applied to the gentlemen for powder and ball; they demurred fupplying him, as he was not duly authorized. The captain, in hafte to fly to the help of his fuffering brethren, proposed procuring the supply by force if needful, to which the volunteers confented. He then fent to the committee, and informed them what he was determined upon. Colonel Wooster came out, and would have persuaded him to wait till he had received proper orders; to which capt. Arnold answered, " None but God Almighty shall prevent my marching." The committee perceiving his fixed refolution, supplied inin; and he marched off inflantly, and with his company reached the American head-quarters by the 20th of April.

[April 23.] The news reached New-York on the Lord's day. On hearing it, capt. Sears conceived the defign of flopping all veffels going to Quebec, Newfoundland, Georgia, and Botton; feveral were about to fail. He confulted Mr. Lamb, who joined in the meafure. They then wrote a letter to the committee of Philadelphia, affuring them that all veffels would be flopt at New-York, and figured it with their names, that fo the affurance might be relied upon. The express being sent off, they contrived to affemble the people, without its being known upon what business; and when they were met, it was concluded upon to shut up the enflom house. The officer was waited on, who, confidering the expediency of a compliance, ordered the keys to be delivered up to capt. Sears. The merchants whose veffels were cleared out, dared not to admit of their failing. The Philadelphia committee, relying upon the affurance that had been given them, so managed as that it was agreed, to shut

ed places.

The hostilities in the Massachusetts threw the city of New-York into fuch a state of tumult, that it was judged expedient, with a view of restoring tranquillity and good order, to appoint a general committee of a hundred for the city and county of New-York, which answered. [May 5.] This committee addressed a letter to the lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council of the city of London, which was figned by feventy-feven of them. In it they declared, that " The disposal of their own property with perfect fpontaniety, and in a manner wholly divested of every appearance of constraint, is their indefeasible birth-right. This exalted blefling they are refolutely determined to defend with their blood, and to transfer uncontaminated to their posterity." They professed their readiness to submit cheerfully to a regulation of commerce, by the legislature of the parent state, excluding, in its nature, every idea of taxation; but reprobated the minister's conciliatory plan. They gave affurance, "That America is grown fo irritable by oppression, that the least shock in any part is, by the most powerful and sympathetic affection, instantaneously felt through the whole continent-That while the whole continent are ardently withing for peace on fuch terms as can be acceded to by Englithmen, they are indefatigable in preparing for the last appeal." Near the close, they faid, "We speak the real sentiments of the confederated colonies on the continent, from Nova-Scotia to Georgia, when we declare, that all the horrors of a civil war will never compel America to submit to taxation by authority of parliament." They concluded with expreffing their confidence of the most vigorous exertions of the city of London to reftore union and mutual peace to the whole empire.

[May 6.] The next day an affociation was figned by upward of a thousand of the principal inhabitants of the city and county. They in the most folemn manner declared, that they affociated to endeavour carrying into execution whatever measures might be recommended by the continental congress, or be resolved upon by their own provincial convention, for the purpose of preserving their constitution, and opposing the execution of the oppressive acts of the British parliament, until a reconciliation between Great-Britain and America, on constitutional principles, can be obtained; and that they would in all things follow the advice of their general committee, respecting the purposes aforestaid, the preservation of peace and good order, and the safety of individuals and private property.

The inhabitants armed themselves also with great diligence and industry. But is not to be inferred, from these strong appearances, that there is a real and general union in fentiment among the New-Yorkers. They are much divided; though each party has thus coalefced with a view of ferving its own particular interest. The tories have joined, to prevent the violences which might otherwise exist, and to check the progress of the sons of The whigs have joined, in hope of drawing the others into fuch lengths in oppoling ministerial measures, as are reprobated by them at prefent.

The New-Jersev people, on receiving the Lexington news, took possession of the province treasury, in which there was about 20,000l. part of it is appropriated to the payment of the troops they are now raifing for the defence of the liberties of

tions for the most serious and painful contest.

The governor of the province laid before the affembly the minister's conciliatory plan; and observed to them; that they were the first affembly on the continent to whom it had been communicated. After confidering it, they faid, "If no other objection to the plan proposed occurred to us, we should esteem it a defertion of fifter colonies, connected by an union, founded on just motives and mutual faith, and conducted by general councils, for a fingle colony to adopt a measure so extensive in confequence, without the advice and confent of those colonies engaged with us by folemn ties in the fame common cause. The complexion of the affembly has been changed. In the choice of deputies for the approaching congress, made last December, Mr. Galloway was left out; and on the fixth of May, the house added three more to the number of their deputies, and the first on the lift was Dr. Franklin. Thus have they, fince his arrival, expressed their approbation of his conduct, and their confidence in his abilities. The plan has been fince proposed to other colony-affemblies, but with no better fuccess than in Pennsylvania.

The account of the action arrived at Baltimore in Maryland, in fix days; the inhabitants immediately feized upon the provincial magazine, containing 1500 fland of arms, &c. They also flopped all exports to the fifning illands, and those colonies which have refused to unite with their brethren in the common cause; and all fupplies to the navy and army at Boston.

In Virginia, a provincial congress met in March, for want of a legal affembly, and took measures for arraying the militia, the whitia laws being expired; and recommended to each county

the raifing of a volunteer company for the better defence of the country. On the 20th of April the governor employed the captain of an armed vessel to convey by night, on board his ship, from the public magazine, out of about one and twenty, fifteen half barrels of powder, containing 50lb. each. The citizens of Williamsburgh were greatly alarmed, so that the mayor and corporation addressed his lordship upon the occasion, who in his answer informed them, that hearing of an infurrection in a neighbouring county, he had removed the powder from the magazine to a place of perfect fecurity; and that whenever it was wanted on any infarrection, it should be delivered in half an hour. The news of the feizure foon reached Hanover-county, upon which capt. Patrick Henry, and the other volunteers of the county, marched for Williamsburgh, with a view of securing the public treasury from the like catastrophe, and of obtaining a return of the powder, or a compensation for it. More than a hundred and fifty, all well accoutred, and making a martial appearance, advanced within 15 miles of the capital; but a fufficient fum of money being paid by the receiver-general to compenfate for the powder, and the citizens engaging to guard the public treasury and magazine, they dispersed and returned to their respective homes.

The value of the whole magazine was very inadequte to the alarm and disturbance which the governor's measure excited.—Neither powder nor muskets were sufficient to answer any essential experience.

tial purpose, or even to justify apprehension.

His lordship was exceedingly irritated at the behaviour of the people, and threw out threats. Those of setting up the royal standard, of ensranchising the negroes, and arming them against their masters, and of destroying the city, with other expressions of a similar tendency, not only spread a general alarm through the colony, but excited a kind of abhorrence of government, and an incurable suspicion of its designs. Mean while, several public meetings were held in different counties, in all of which the seizing of the powder, and the governor's threats, were reprobated in the strongest terms. The news of Lexington engagement arriving when the minds of the Virginians were in such a ferment, tended to increase their apprehensions, and of course attention to the militia and volunteer companies.

It was not long ere the fame news reached Charlestown in South-Carolina. The hopes of the inhabitants, that the non-importation and non-exportation agreements would induce the parent state to recede from her demands, were blasted on the arrival of a packet from London, the 19th of April; but when the Lexingion news was received, they concluded that the colonies were to be dragooned into flavery. The thought excited the greatest indignation; but they paused, upon considering their situation. The province, for near two hundred miles coastways, was accessible to the British fleets and armies. It had but a few trifling fortifications, and these held by British officers .-The western frontiers were exposed to the favages; and the negroes might be prevailed upon, by infinuations, to flay their masters. The governor had the command of the militia; and all the officers had their commissions from him. The inhabitants were quite defenceless, without arms, ammunition, clothing, ships, money, or men skilled in the arts of war. The stores of the merchants afforded no supplies of a warlike nature; no exception having been made in the general scheme of non-importation. They could not however brook a mean fubmiffion to the dictates of Britain; and therefore determined upon a manly and virtuous refittance. Accordingly, on the night after intelligence of actual hostilities was received, a number of the principal gentlemen of the town possessed themselves of twelve hundred stand of arms with the accoutrements; removed them directly from the royal arfenal, and afterward distributed them among the men inlifted in the public fervice.

Let us return to notice an expedition planned in Connecticut. The necessity of securing Tyconderoga, was early attended to by many in New-England; but some Connecticut gentlemen were first in attempting the measure. Secrecy was essential to fuccess; and delay might be dangerous. There was no waiting to confult the continental congress; beside, it would not have been fafe to have communicated the scheme to that body, as it was known there would be individuals in it, on whose fidelity the Americans could not rely. Mesfrs. Deane, Wooster, Parfons, and others, undertook the affair. They applied to the affembly for a loan, which was furnished, to the amount of about eighteen hundred dollars, and which they gave bonds to be accountable. General Gage had fet the example of attempting to feize upon military flores, and by fo doing had commenced hostilities; fo that retaliation appeared more than warrantable, even an act of felf-defence. The expedition went on with rapidity. Several militia captains pushed forward to Salisbury to acquaint Messrs. Blagden's (nephews to your former acquaintance, the carpenter, of the same name) with the design, and to procure their affistance. One was ill, the other * joined in the proposed manœuvre. After a little deliberation, they concluded upon fpending no time in obtaining men; but, having provided a fufficient quantity of powder and ball; fet off on horseback for Bennington to engage colonel Allen. They conferred wi h him upon their arrival; and then tarried with others to bake bread, and prepare other necessaries, while the colonel went on to raise the men who were wanting, and who were to meet the managers at Caffleton. While these were on their way to the place of rendezvous, they were met by a countryman, apparently an undefigning honest traveller, but who was either himself wellfkilled and a principal, or had been well-tutored by fome one or other, that had either suspected or gained knowledge of the expedition, and meant to render it abortive. They addressed him, "From whence came you?—From Ty *, left it yesterday, at fuch an hour.—Has the garrison received any reinforcement?— Yes; I saw them; there were a number of artillery men and other foldiers.-What are they doing? Are they making fafcines? Don't know what fascines are. They are tying up slicks and brush in bundles, and putting them where the walls are down."—Mr. Samuel Blagden put many infnaring questions about the dress and trimmings of the men, &c. The answers tended to confirm the man's story. The company was slaggered; and it being debated in council, whether they should not return as they had no cannon, it was determined by a majority of one only, to proceed. At Castleton they met colonel Allen with his men, and altogether made two hundred and feventy perfons; two hundred and thirty of them were green mountain boys, fo called from their reliding within the limits of the Green Mountains; as the Hampshire grants are denominated, from the range of green mountains that runs through them. They are a brave hardy generation, chiefly fettlers from New-Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Connecticut t. Sentries were placed immediately on all the roads, to prevent any intelligence being carried to Tvconderoga. After the junction at Callleton, colonel Arnold arrived, with only a fingle fervant. The day after his getting to Cambridge with his volunteer company, he attended on the Maffachusetts committee of safety, and reported that there were at Tyconderoga, 80 pieces of heavy cannon, 20 of brass from 4 to 18 pounders, 10 or a dozen mortars, a number of final arms. and confiderable flores; and that the fort was in a ruinous condition, and as he supposed garrisoned by about forty men. Upon this the committee, on the third of May, appointed him a colonel of four hundred men, whom he was to inlift and march for the reduction of Tyconderoga. The colonel was known only to

Mr. Blagden. A council was called; his powers were examined; and at length it was agreed, that he should be admitted to. join and act with them, that fo the public might be benefited. It was fettled, however, that colonel Allen should have the supreme command, and colonel Arnold was to be his affiftant; with which the latter appeared fatisfied, as he had no right by his commiffion, either to command or interfere with the others, who were not only out of the Massachusetts line, but the subjects of another colony. The names of the leaders, besides what have been mentioned, were Meffrs. Motte, Phelps's (two brothers) Biggelow, Bull, and Nichols, befide colonels Easton, Brown, and Warner,

After it had been determined in a council to fet off the next morning early for Tv, and fome of the managers had retired, a fecond council was held, and it was concluded to proceed that very night, leaving Messrs. Blagden, Biggelow, and Nichols, with a party of men, thirty in all, officers included, to march early in the morning for Skeensborough, and secure major Skeen, his negroes and tenants. This council might have been occasioned by the return of captain Noah Phelps, who the day before, having difguifed himself, entered the fort in the character of a countryman wanting to be shaved. In hunting for a barber, he observed every thing critically, asked a number of rustic questions, affected great ignorance, and paffed unfulpected. Before night he withdrew, came and joined his party, and in the morning guided them to the place of destination.

Colonel Allen, with his 230 green mountain boys, arrived at Lake Champlain, and opposite to Tyconderoga, on the ninth at night. Boats were procured with difficulty; when he and colonel Arnold croffed over with 83 men, and landed near the garrison. Here a dispute took place between the colonels, the latter became affuming and fwore he would go in first, the other fwore he should not. The gentlemen present interposed, and the matter was accommodated upon the footing that both should go in together. They advanced along fide of each other, colonel Allen on the right hand of colonel Arnold, and entered the port leading to the fort, in the gray of the morning, [May 10.] A fentry fnapped his fusee at colonel Allen, and then retreated through the covered way to the parade; the main body of the Americans followed, and immediately drew up. Captain De la Place, the commander, was furprifed a bed in his room. was ordered to give up the fort; upon his asking by what authority, colonel Allen replied, "I demand it in the name of the great Jehovah and the continental congress." The congress knew nothing of the matter, and did not commence their existence till fome hours after: when they began their fession, they chose the honorable Peyton Randolph president, and Mr. Charles Thomfon fecretary, each with a unanimous voice; and having agreed "That the reverend Mr. Duche be requested to open the congress with prayers to-morrow morning," and appointed a committee to acquaint him with their request, adjourned till the next day. Had captain De la Place been upon the parade with his men, he could have made no effectual refultance. The fort was out of repair, and he had but about thirty effectives.— Could he have gained timely intelligence, he might have procured a reinforcement from St. John's. You have the particulars of the military flores taken at Tyconderoga below *. After colonel Allen had landed, the boats were fent back for the remainder of the men under colonel Seth Warren, but the place was furprised before he could get over. Immediately upon his joining the fuccessful party, he was fent off to take pollestion of Crown Point, where a fergeant and twelve men performed garrison duty; but the greatest acquisition was that of more than 100 pieces of cannon. The complete command of Lake Champlain was of high importance to the Americans, and could not be effected without their getting possession of a sloop of war lying at St. John's, at the bottom of the lake. It was determined to man and arm a schooner lying at South Bay, and that colonel Arnold should command her, and that colonel Allen should command the batteaus, a name generally affixed to boats of a particular construction, calculated for navigating the lakes and rivers, and drawing but little water, though heavily laden. The wind being fresh in the fouth, the schooner out failed the batteaus, and colonel Arnold furprifed the floop. The wind shifting suddenly to the north, and blowing fresh, in about an hour's time colonel Arnold failed with the prize and fchooner for Tyconderoga, and met colonel Allen with his party.

The furprife of Skeenfborough was so conducted, that the negroes were all secured, and major Skeen, the son, taken while out a shooting, and his strong stone house possessed, and the pass compleatly gained, without any bloodshed, the same as at Tyconderoga. Had the major received the least intimation, the attempt must have miscarried; for he had about sifty tenants night at hand, besides eight negroes and twelve workmen.

The prisoners were the captain, a lieutenant, a gunner, 2 sergeants,

main in garrison.

[May 18.] When the news of Tyconderoga's being taken reached the continental congress, they earnestly recommended it to the committees of the cities and counties of New-York and Albany, immediately to cause the cannon and stores to be removed from thence to the fouth end of Lake George; but that an exact inventory should be taken of them, "in order that they may be fafely returned, when the refloration of the former harmony between Great-Britain and these colonies, so ardently wished for by the latter, shall render it prudent and confistent with the over-ruling law of felf-prefervation." Whatever may be the drift of a few in congress, the body wish to keep the door open for an accommodation. This was apparent in the advice they gave the New-Yorkers, three days before the preceding recommendation. The city and county of New-York applied to them for information how to conduct toward the troops expected there. The congress resolved, "that it be recommended, for the present, to the inhabitants of New-York, that if the troops which are expected, should arrive, the faid colony act on the defensive, so long as may be consistent with their fafety and security; that the troops be permitted to remain in the barracks, fo long as they behave peaceably and quietly, but that they be not fullered to erect fortifications, or take any steps for cutting off the communication betwen the town and country, and that if they commit hostilities or invade private property, the inhabitants should defend themselves and their property, and repel force by force; that the warlike flores be removed from the town; that places of retreat, in case of necessity, be provided for the women and children of New-York; and that a sufficient number of men be imbodied, and kept in constant readiness for protecting the inhabitants from infult and injury."

Let us come to the Maffachufetts.

Mr. Hancock having been chosen at the last election, on December 5, 1774, one of the delegates to the general congress; and the time approaching when it became necessary for him to prepare for his journey, Dr. Joseph Warren was chosen president of the provincial congress pro tempore.

[April 27.] The inhabitants of Botton lodged with the felectmen, according to agreement with general Gage, 1778 fire arms, 634 pillols, 273 bayonets, and 38 blunderbulles. The fame day the provincial congress recommended to the inhabitants of the sca-ports, the removal of their effects, &c.

April

April 28.7 A circular letter was written to the feveral towns of the colony, wherein after noting the affair of the nineteenth, it was faid, " we conjure you, by all that is dear, by all that is facred, that you give all assistance possible in forming the army. Our all is at stake. Death and devastation are the certain confequences of delay. Every moment is infinitely precious. An hour lost may deluge your country in blood, and entail perpetual flavery upon the few of your posterity, who may survive the carnage. We beg and intreat, as you will answer it to your country, to your consciences, and above all as you will answer it to God himself, that you will hasten and encourage, by all poslible means, the inlistment of men to form the army; and fend them forward to head quarters at Cambridge, with that expedition which the vast importance and instant urgency of the affair demand." This address was attended to, the men discovered a readiness to turn out for the salvation of their country. and the women applied themselves with cheerfulness to the fitting out of their hulbands, fathers and brothers, for the important expedition, while the dangers of it were overlooked or difregarded. After a few days continuance before Bolton, great numbers returned home; fome to follow their business, and others to procure necessaries for the time they had inlisted or meant to inlist for. During the interval between this return, and the provincials reforting afresh to the place of rendezvous, the land entrance into and out of the town by the neck, was next to unguarded! Not more than between fix and feven hundred men. under colonel Lemuel Robinson of Dorchester, were engaged in defending fo inportant a pass, for several days together.-For nine days and nights the colonel never shifted his clothes, nor lay down to fleep; as he had the whole duty upon him even down to the adjutant, and as there was no officer of the day to affift. The officers, in general, had left the camp, in order to raise the wanted number of men. The colonel was obliged therefore, for the time mentioned, to patrole the guards every night, which gave him a round of nine miles to traverse.

[May 1.] The Maffachufetts congress allotted to the different towns, the five thousand poor expected out of Boston.—Rhode-Island and Connecticut had made paper money, with which to furnish a plentiful substitute for cash and to answer present exigencies. The men repairing from these colonies, for the defence of the Massachusetts, were supplied with this money; the Massachusetts therefore resolved, that it should pass in all payments.

The general affembly of Connecticut appointed Dr. Johnson, and Oliver Wolcot, esq. a committee from their body, to write upon general Gage, and defired the governor to write in their name to the general, relative to the fituation of public affairs, and the late unfortunate transactions in the Massachusetts. He wrote on the twenty-eighth of April; and the committee repaired to Boston with the letter. Both the provincial congress and the committee of fafety were greatly alarmed at the transaction. The first wrote [May 2.] to the delegates, whom they had fent to the colony, reprefenting to them the fatal confequences that might follow, upon any one colony's undertaking to negociate separately, either with parliament, ministry, or their agent here. The last wrote to the colony itself, entreating it to afford immediately all possible aid. Governor Trumbull acquainted them, in his answer of May the 4th, that they need not fear their firmnefs, deliberation and unanimity, to purfue measures which may appear best for common defence and fafety; and that Connecticut will be cautious of trufting promifes, which it may be in the power of any to evade.

[May 3.] On the fame day, on which general Gage fent a fensible and respectful answer to governor Trumbull, the Massachilfetts congress empowered the receiver general to borrow 75,000l. Sterling upon notes, bearing an interest of fix per cent. that fo they might support their forces; they also forward difpatches to the general congress, containing accounts of their proceedings. In their letter they mentioned, "The sudden exigency of our public affairs, precluded the possibility of waiting for your direction in these important measures, more especially as a confiderable reinforcement from Great-Britain is daily expected in this colony, and we are now reduced to the fad alternative of defending ourselves by arms, or submitting to be slaughtered." They modefly suggested the necessity of a powerful army on the fide of America. They took notice, that the inhabitants of many of their fea-ports, had removed, and were removing their families and effects, to avoid destruction from the ships of war; and expressed their confidence in the wisdom and ability of the continent to support them, so far as it should appear necessary for the common cause of the American colonies.

[May 4.] The committee of fafety wrote to the governor and company of Connecticut, most earnessly pressing them to send immediately three or four thousand men, that so an important post might be secured, which otherwise the enemy would be likely to possess themselves of, as soon as their reinforcement arrived. The troops were defired to be forwarded in companies as fast as they could be got ready. They seut also to Rhode-Island, and urged their marching a body of troops to assist on the like occasion. They proceeded to resolve, "That the public good requires that government in full form ought to be taken up immediately." Advice was received, that a number of transports with troops were just arrived at Boston from England.

[May 5.] The provincial congress resolved, "That general Gage has, by the late transactions, and many other means, utterly disqualified himself from serving his colony as a governor, or in any other capacity; and that therefore no obedience is in suture due to him; but that on the contrary, he ought to be considered and guarded against, as an unnatural and inveterate enemy to the country."

[May 9.] . The committee of fafety ordered the commanding officers of ten neighbouring towns, to march one half of the militia, and all the minute men under their command, forthwith to Roxbury, that so the British troops might not come and possess themselves of that post. Before it was properly strengthened, general Gage entertained fuch defign. General Thomas, who commands there, gained information of what was intended, on the day it was to be be executed. His whole force confifted only of feven hundred men. The post comprehended a large broad high hill. A road leads to the top of it, visible in some parts, to perfons at the entrance into Boston; it passes over the hill and descends into a hallow, from whence you can turn off, and passing circuitously enter again upon the faid road. The general took advantage of this circumstance, and continued marching his feven hundred men round and round the hill, by which he multiplied their appearance, to any who was reconnoitering them at Boston. The dress of the militia was extremely various, and confisted of their common clothing, which prevented the discovery of a deception, that might otherwise have been soon detected, had they worn a uniform and possessed regimental ensigns. This warlike imposition most probably prevented general Gage's attacking and carrying the post, by the possession of which he would have had it in his power to direct his march to any part of the country he pleafed. The colonels of the feveral regiments were ordered to repair immediately to Cambridge, with the men they had inlifted; and part of the cannon and stores to be removed to some distance of security; and breast works to be erected at different places, to prevent the enemy's passing into the country from Boston neck, and to annoy them if they crossed the river and advanced through Charlestown, or if they attempted going by water to Medford. The Maffachusetts congress concluded on difarming the difaffected inhabitants; and that no person should move with his effects out of the colony, unless leave was grant[May 15.] They refolved upon a letter to the eaftern tribe of Indians, to fecure their friendship, and engage them on the side of the colonies, and proposed to raise a company of them to serve in the war. Four days after, the committee of safety voted, that captain John Lane have inlitting papers for raising such company. The provincials reprobate in the bitterest terms, the idea of the Indians being employed by the ministry against themselves; so that there is a seeming inconsistency in their attempting to engage them against the British troops. But let it be remembered, that the Indians will probably take part with the one side or the other; for through a restless warlike temper, they are not in common disposed to observe a neutrality; and that there is a wide difference between employing them against armed soldiers, and letting them loose upon desenceless settlers, men, women and children.

Skirmithes were occasioned at different times and places, by the attempts of each party to carry off stock from the small islands, with which the bay of Boston is agreeably interspersed, and afforded the mixt spectacle of thips, boats and men engaged by land and water. These small engagements were not trisling in their consequences. The advantage was generally on the side of the Americans, which elated their spirits. They also learnt from them to face danger, and to run hazards; and it is by being habituated to these, that probably the greatest quantum of courage is acquired. Frequent skirmishes are good preparatives, by which to qualify raw foldiers to fight as veterans in fet battles.

[May 21.] Two floops, and an armed schooner with soldiers, sailed to Grape-Island to get hay. The provincials sollowed them as soon as the tide admitted, drove them off by their approach, burnt all the hay, about eighty ton, and brought off the cattle from the island.

[May 24.] A committee having been appointed to inquire what was the flock of powder in certain towns, reported, that in thirty-nine towns in Suffolk, Effex, Middlefex, Plymouth, and Worcefler, there were 67 3-4 barrels. The rest of the towns in the colony had none worth mentioning. How painful a circumstance, the small quantity of powder, to those Americans, who have any idea of the great consumption which war occasions! The want of it had been sensibly felt for some time; and therefore, beside the adoption of other measures, orders were given for the importation of that, and other military stores; but it must be long before they can be procured in this way, should they come safe.

[May 25.] The Cerberus arrived at Boston with the three generals, Howe, Clinton, and Burgoyne, They were so assured in their own mistaken apprehensions, that there would be no occasion to draw the sword in support of ministerial measures, that they had prepared to amuse themselves with fishing and other diversions, instead of expecting to be engaged in military service. They were aftonished at the situation of affairs, and when in company with generals Gage and Haldiman, alked how the fortie happened. General Haldiman answered, "I knew nothing about it, till the barber came in to shave me, and said, that the troops were gone out and that they had been fighting: I did not choose that he should know I got my information from him. I therefore called my footman, and fent him out upon a frivolous errand, well knowing, that if there was any truth in what the barber reported, he would bring me word of it, which he did. In this way I became acquainted with what had happened." The newly arrived generals declared their furprise in the fignificant looks which followed this relation from the fecond in command.

[May 27.] About fix hundred of the Massachusetts and New-Hampshire forces were employed to bring off the stock from Hog-Island and Noddles-Island, which lie contiguous: the intervening paffage is fordable at certain times of the tide. A party went on and fired the hay and barn on Noddles-Island, on which a number of marines croffed from Boston; and, upon the provincials retreating to Hog-Island, were decoyed down to the water fide, when a hot action commenced, which did not close with the day. The king's troops amounted to fome hundreds, and were supported by an armed schooner of four fix pounders and twelve fwivels, an armed floop, and the barges all fixed with fwivels. The provincials were commanded by general Putnam. Dr. Warren's zeal and courage would not admit of his remaining at a distance: upon hearing what was going forward, he repaired to the fpot to encourage the men. They had two pieces of artillery, which were well ferved, and did confiderable execution. The night was very dark, but the action continued all through it. Toward morning the schooner got aground upon Winnisimmet ferry ways; the British were obliged to abandon her, and the provincials boarded, and after stripping her of every thing valuable, fet her on fire. They loft not a man, and had only three wounded, not one mortally. The regulars were faid to have fuffered very much, not to have had less than two hundred killed and wounded. The loss was, probably, greatly exaggerated: that, however, had a good effect on the provincials. The affair was matter of no finall triumph to them, and they felt, upon the occasion, more courageous than ever. VOL. I. May

[May 30.] The provincials went afresh on Noddle's-Island, and burnt the mansion house, which answered no good purpose whatever. But there are too many, who destroy property merely because of its having belonged, or being supposed to belong to those Americans, who have taken the opposite side of the question in the present controversy. The stock, consisting of between five and fix hundred sheep and lambs, twenty head of cattle, besides horses, was taken off by them in the course of the day. The next day five hundred sheep and thirty head of cattle were removed off Pettick's-Island by party under colonel Robinson. On the night of June the second, eight hundred sheep and lambs, together with a number of cattle, were carried off Deer-Island by a corps of provincials under major Greaton.

The agreement with general Gage, relative to the inhabitants leaving the town of Boston, was well observed in the beginning; and their request was granted, with the approbation of all. But after a fhort time, they were detained upon the plea, that per= fons going from thence for the goods of those who chose to abide there were not properly treated. The embarrassments and delays which the inhabitants had to contend with, induced the provincial congress to order the sending of a letter to general Gage, to remonstrate with him upon the subject. The letter how. ever did not answer. The truth is, after a number were allowed to depart, great clamours were raifed. Such persons as were, or pretended to be well affected to the British government, alledged that none but the ill-inclined were for removing, and that when they were fafe with their effects, the town would be fet on fire. A demur foon afterward arose about the meaning of the word effects, whether merchandife was included; and the general, being fenfible, that the permitting articles of that kind to be carried out, might strengthen the Americans in their resistance, would not admit of their removal. This proved a hardship to many who guitted the town, as it deprived them of the resource for living in their accustomed affluence. In a variety of instances, the pafiports were fo conducted, that families were cruelly divided; wives were separated from their husbands; children from their parents; the aged and the fick from their relations and friends, who wished to attend and comfort them. The general was very averse to the allowing of women and children to leave Boston, thinking they contributed to the fafety of the place, and prevented his being attacked; but of that no real danger existed, notwithstanding the high tone of the people without, and the intimations of some within the town. Numbers of the poor and hapless were however sent out, and several of them infected with, or president,

vincials were greatly endangered.

These were employed in collecting their force, from every quarter, with all possible dispatch, which could not be dispensed with, confidering the reinforcements which had arrived, and were arriving at Boston. [June 3.] But they were distressed for want of money; and a letter was dispatched, by the Maslachufetts congress, to their receiver-general, upon the absolute necesfity of paying the colony forces immediately, and directing his attendance forthwith; and also acquainting him, that a gentleman at Salem had 3751. fterling, which he was willing to lend the province, and which would be of the utmost importance to pay directly to the foldiers, and might prevent the greatest mischiefs. The want of cash obliged them to have a recourse to province notes, which they struck off night and day, for the advance pay of the men who had inlifted.

[June 10.] They were better off as to provision, and established a too plentiful allowance, beyond what the troops could expend. By the general return of the army at Cambridge, it amounted on the ninth to 1581 officers, commissioned, sergeants; &c. and 6063 privates, in all 7644. But such was the want of regularity, that no dependence could be had upon its exactness. The number of privates was probably much aggravated. Too many of the officers did not fcruple to make falle returns for their own emolument. The large proportion of them shows that the regiments were far from being full, or were much over-officered. Several of the Massachusetts officers are miserable tools, and must be discarded sooner or later. It is owing to their having been elected by the very privates they command; and to the refignations of a number who had governmental commissions, but have thrown them up, from an apprehension that the Americans will not fucceed; this gave an opening for a fet of fellows totally deftitute of both courage and honor, to push themselves forward and get chosen.

[June 12.] General Gage issued a proclamation offering a pardon in the king's name, to all who should forthwith lay down their arms, and return to their peaceable occupations, except Samuel Adams and John Hancock. All, who did not accept of the proffered mercy, who should protect, assist, conceal or correspond with such, were to be treated as rebels and traitors. also declared, that as a stop was put to the due course of justice, martial law should take place till the laws were restored to their due efficacy. The proclamation had no other effect than to put the provincials upon looking out for the operations which were to fucceed. [June 1.1.] The Maffachufetts congress chose their

ces; the first having been chosen the day before.

A discovery has been made, which will deliver down to posterity the name of governor Hutchinson, loaded with instany. An accident has thrown into the hands of the Americans, the books of his copied letters to the ministry and others, in his own hand writing. By means of them, the several charges brought against him, of his entity to his own colony, of his consumnate duplicity, of his advising ministry to alter the charter, and to use force for the establishment of their plans, and of his assuming them that they would meet with no effectual resistance from the boasting sons of liberty, whose courage would certainly fail them when put to the trial, have been authenticated beyond the possibility of a denial.

When he quitted the province, all his furniture was left behind in his feat at Milton. After the Lexington engagement, the committee of the town removed it, in order to fave it from being totally ruined. Mr. Samuel Henshaw*, desirous of seeing how the house looked, when fiript of all the furniture, repaired thither with the gentleman who had the key. He'went at length up into a dark garret, where he discovered an old trunk, which he was told was left behind, as it contained nothing but a parcel of useless papers. Curiosity led him to examine them, when he foon discovered a letter book of Mr. Hutchinson's, which he secured, and then posted away to Dr. Warren, to whom he related what had happened; on which an order was foon fent to general Thomas, at Roxbury, to possess himself of the trunk. It was brought to his quarters: and there, through the imprudent. exultations of fome about the general, the contents were too often exposed to persons resorting thither, and some single letters conveyed away: one for the public good, it being thought that if the fame was generally known, it might be of differvice in the present moment, as it had not a favorable aspect upon the flaunch patriotifin of Mr. Hancock. The letter books and other papers were anterward taken proper care of; and have been submitted to my inspection. Many of his letters, beside what have already appeared, will be printed: those you meet with as his, in the Boston Gazette, or actually taken from it, you may depend upon as genuine, and faithfully copied.

Mr. Hutchinson behaved much to the satisfaction of the public as judge of probates. He was ready to affist, in a most obliging manner, the widow and the orphan with his advice, whenever their business called them before him. As chief justice he was not exceptionable, only when he supported the cause of government against the claims of the people. When in the chair of the first magistrate, his appointments to different offices were generally of men well qualified for discharging the duties of the fame, though mostly supporters of government: he was advised by a British naval officer to secure Mess. Hancock and S. Adams by promoting them; but replied, that though fuch a scheme might answer in regard to Mr. H. it would not as to Mr. A. for it would be only giving him more power to aid him in his oppofition, and that he should not be able afterward to remove him. Under the charter the governor cannot remove from offices without the confent of the council; and Mr. Hutchinson knew that Mr. S. Adams's interest in the council would be greater than his own. He was used to profess the warmest attachment to the good of his native colony, and that he was ever aiming to promote its happiness; and would frequently show the letters he had written about the time of the stamp-act, in opposition to that measure. He ingratiated himself by his free, familiar, and condescending intercourse with the common people, whom he would join, walk and converse with, in his way, from the meeting to his feat. On these accounts he had a number of friends and advocates, who thought highly of him: but fince the discovery of his letters, they begin to own that they were deceived in the man, and wofully mistaken in the good opinion they entertained of him. He will be execrated in America if not in Great-Britain.

The dispatches forwarded to the general congress from the Massachusetts the beginning of May, led on to their resolving themselves into a committee of the whole to take into consideration the state of America. Before they finished this great business, they resolved unanimously "That all exportations to Quebec, Nova-Scotia, the island of St. John's, Newfoundland, Georgia, except the parish of St. John's, and to East and West Florida, immediately cease, and that no provision of any kind, or other necessaries be surnished to the British sisheries, on the American coasts, until it be otherwise determined by the congress." The parish of St. John's was excepted, as it had sent a delegate to congress. They continued to sit in a committee from day to day till the 24th, when the honorable Peyton Randolph, being under a necessary of returning home, and the chair being thereby vacated, they unanimously chose the honorable John Hancock, esq; president.

[May 26.] A report from the committee being read, the congress came unanimously into certain resolutions; and among other masters they resolved, "That the colonies be immediately put into a state of defence: but that, as they most ardently wish for a restoration of the harmony formerly substituting between the mother country and these colonies, for the promotion of this most desirable reconciliation, an humble and dutiful petition be presented to his majesty." It was then resolved, but not unanimously, "That measures be entered into for opening a negociation, in order to accommodate the unhappy disputes substituting between Great-Britain and these colonies, and that this be made a part of the petition to the king."—Afterward "That the militia of New-York be armed and trained, and in constant readings of the petition to the state of the petition to the state of the petition to the king."

ness to act at a moment's warning."

Mr. Dickinson, the author of the farmer's letters, is now a member of congress for Pennsylvania. His heart was much engaged in bringing about a reconciliation, and he labored hard in procuring a second petition to the king; but it was opposed by several and occasioned strong debates for some days. However, for the sake of congressional harmony it was at length unanimously agreed to; as they that opposed it had not the least idea of its proving effectual, from a full persuasion that the British-ministry would be so irritated, by what had happened on April the nineteenth, as to reject all tenders short of full submission.—these nevertheless declined voting, that measures for a negociation should make a part of the petition. Since the Lexington engagement, many of the New-Englanders believe that the contest must end in absolute slavery or real independence.

[May 29.] Congress wrote a letter to the Canadians, stiling them the oppressed inhabitants of Canada, and themselves friends and countrymen. It was designed to persuade them, that their present form of government is a form of tyranny, and that they, their wives and children, are made slaves; to prevent their taking a part against the colonies in the present contest; and to procure a union of all in defence of common liberty.

[June 2.] It was refolved, "That no provisions of any kind be furnished or supplied to, or for the use of the British army or navy, in the Massachusetts-bay, or of any transport."

[June 7.] Congress, for the first time, stiled the colonies THE TWELVE UNITED COLONIES, in a resolve, "That Thursday the 20th, of July, be observed throughout the twelve united colonies, as a day of humiliation, fasting and prayer. From hencesorward the united colonies will come into use.

[June 8.] Major Skeen (the father) of Skeensborough, with other officers, upon their arriving the evening before at Philadelphia, in a vessel from London, were taken into custody.—Congress being informed of it, and the faid Skeen had been late-

If appointed governor of the forts of Tyconderoga and Crown, Point, and had declared that he was authorized to raise a regiment in America; they appointed a committee to examine his papers, as also those of a lieutenant in the regulars.

[June 9.] They, having been applied to, by a letter of May 16th, from the Mallachusetts convention, for their explicit advice, resolved, "That no obedience being due to the act of parliament for altering the charter of the colony of Massachusetts-Bay, nor to a governor or lieutenant governor who will not obferve the directions of, but endeavour to subvert that charter, the governor and lieutenant governor of that colony are to be confidered as absent, and their offices vacant; and as there is no council there, and the inconveniencies arising from the suspension of the powers of government are intolerable; that, in order to conform as near as may be to the spirit and substance of the charter, it be recommended to the provincial convention to write letters to the inhabitants of the feveral places, entitled to reprefentation in affembly, requesting them to choose such representatives; and that the affembly, when chosen, do elect counsellors; and that fuch affembly or council exercise the powers of government, until a governor of his majefty's appointment will confent to govern the colony according to its charter.

- [June 10.] It was recommended to the united colonies to collect falt-petre and fulphur, and to manufacture the same into gunpowder, for the use of the continent.

[June 14.] Congress agreed to the resolutions of the committee of the whole house, "That six companies of expert riflemen be immediately raised in Pennsylvania, two in Maryland, and two in Virginia; and that each company, confishing of fixty-eight privates, beside officers, march as soon as completed, and join the army near Boston, to be there employed as light infantry."

[June 15.] They proceeded to choose by ballot a general to command all the continental forces, and George Washington, esq;

[June 16.] The prefident informed him of the choice which the congress had made, and of their requesting his acceptance of that employment. Colonel Washington, standing in his place, answered,

" Mr. President,

"Though I am truly fensible of the high honor done me in this appointment, yet I feel great distress from a consciousness, that my abilities and military experience may not be equal to the extensive and important trust. However, as the congress desire it, I will enter upon the momentous duty, and exert every power I possess in their service, and for the support of the glorious cause.

I beg they will accept my most cordial thanks for this distinguished testimony of their approbation.

"But, lest some unlucky event should happen unfavourable to my reputation, I beg it may be remembered by every gentleman in the room, that I this day declare, with the utmost sincerity, I do not think myself equal to the command I am honored with.

"As to pay, Sir, I beg leave to affure the congress, that as no pecuniary consideration could have tempted me to accept this arduous employment, at the expense of my domestic ease and happiness, I do not wish to make any profit from it. I will keep an exact account of my expenses. Those, I doubt not, they will discharge, and that is all I desire."

The colonel did not aspire to the honor of commanding the army; he was rather folicitous to avoid it, upon an apprehenfion of his inadequacy to the importance of the service. ality of congress, however, affished by a political motive, rendered his reasons unavailing; and led him to "launch into a wide and extensive field, too boundless for his abilities, and far, very fur leyond his experience," as his prevailing modesty induced him to express himself. He is dauntless, active, attentive to bufinels, temperate, humane, formed for gaining and fecuring the affections of officers and foldiers, far from haughty and supercilious, though naturally referved; which is a quality that may fecure him from answering, without offending, many improper questions, that the New-Englanders will be likely to ask, for they are amazingly addicted to inquisitiveness: this is greatly owing to the equality that prevails among them, and leads them into those mutual freedoms, which are consured in places where distinction in fortune and rank are far more prevalent and disproportioned. The personal appearance of the colonel is noble and engaging. He certainly possesses strong powers of mind, which will tend much to supply, in a short season, any present deficiencies, that the want of more extensive reading, and of more practical knowledge in military matters, may inevitably occasion. His days have been spent in America, and he has had little opportunity of feeing fervice. As you have already been informed, in 1755, he prevented the total ruin of the British troops after general Braddock's defeat, by covering their retreat with his rangers: but he has never been accustomed to the command of a regular regiment, to which is to be imputed his faying to the volunteers he lately commanded in Virginia, that a gun and a good fword or hanger was all the foldier wanted, without mentioning a word of the bayonet—it was all that the ranger wanted. When the last French war was closed the cessions made to Britain in these American regions, cut off all expectation of future hostile armies in the country; and made the professed study of the arts of war superfluous to a person inclined to the pleasure of a plantation.

Though the late Rev. Mr. Davis, whom you well remember when at London, inferted the following note in a fermon of his on fome special occasion, "I may point out to the public that heroic youth colonel Washington, whom I cannot but hope Providence has hitherto preserved in so signal a manner for some important fervice to his country:" yet as no human knowledge could, at that period, fathom the events of the prefent day; and as there was no evidence of its being in a degree prophetic, it can be afcribed only to the admiration the author felt while contemplating the character of the colonel. But his being a person of ftrict honor and probity, was undoubtedly a main reason with congress for electing him to the chief command of the American army. They are fully perfuaded of his patriotifm, that it is not pretended: that he will not betray the cause of the united colonies; that he will not lavish away those scanty supplies, which call for the greatest economy; that he will never prey upon the vitals of his country to enrich hunfelf, nor countenance others in doing it; that while he is intrufted with the power of the fword, he will pay a facred regard to the civil rights of his fellow fabiects: and that he will not add-needless barbarity to the unavoidable horrors and calamities of war. He does not understand French; the knowledge of which many will view as an iniportant accomplishment, especially should the continuance of the prefent rupture make the aid of France hereafter a defirable acquilition. But should the times ever induce French advenurers to repair in shoals to head quarters, he may bless his ignorance for fecuring him from many impertinent, long, and tirefome applications of military men, of no eminence and little worth, mere foldiers of fortune, who are after rank and riches, both which the united colonies should deal out with a parsimonious hand, in accommodation to their own circumstances. He entered on the forty-fourth year of his age the 11th of last Feburuary. You will wish to know the political motive, which may have swayed colonel Washington. You must not look for it in any supposed neglect on the part of the British government, after he had done them such eminent service in covering the retreat of their troops in 1755. This may be infinuated to lessen his character. - But did he even think himfelf flighted at the time, he would scarce have remembered it, much less have harboured any resentment upon the occasion, for twenty years together. The political motive must certainly have been of another nature. It was probably complex. A common danger has united the colonies; but Vol. I.

has not eradicated all the jealousies that before existed among them. New-York, Pennsylvania, and the colonies to the fouthward, have not fuch confidence in the Maffachufetts-bay, as to admit that one of their own natives should be the commander in chief. There is too great a nationality among the Bay-men: fuch a one might be unduly prejudiced in favor of his own colony. Befide, colonel Walhington and the other colonists were in pursuit of an honorable accommodation, and had not the most distant thought of separating from Great-Britain. They could not be certain, whatever was the case at present, that the Massa. chusetts would not shortly aim at a separation: it was then a matter of confequence who headed the army. Whatever fome of the Massachusetts delegates might wish in their hearts, they perceived the necessity of accommodating themselves to the inclinations of others, at fuch a criffs; and hence the unanimity with which colonel Washington has been elected: for though it was by ballot, it was not without pre-concerted counfel.

[June 17.] A draught of General Washington's commission was agreed to, and ordered to be fairly transcribed, signed and delivered to him. After which the congress declared, that they would maintain and assist, and adhere to him, with their lives and fortunes, in the maintenance and preservation of American liberty. They then proceeded to choose by ballot Artemas Ward, esq. first major general, Horatio Gates adjutant general, and Charles Lee, esq. second major general. Two days after, they chose Philip Schuyler, esq. third major general, and Israel Put-

[June 15.] The committee of fafety, having received various accounts of the movements of general Gage's army, and of his intention foon to make an attempt to penetrate into the country, recommended to the congress the ordering of all the militia to hold themselves in readiness to march on the shortest notice; and to the council of war, the maintaining of Bunker's-hill by a sufficient force posted thereon, and the taking of such steps respecting Dorchester neck as to them should appear to be for the security of the colony. Bunker's-hill is just at the entrance of the peninsula of Charlestown, and is considerably high and large.

[June 16.] Orders were issued, that a detachment of a thoufand men, under colonel Prescott, do march at evening and intrench upon the hill. By some mistake Breed's hill, high and large like the other, but situated on the surthest part of the peninsula next to Boston, was marked out for the intrenchment

instead of Bunker's. The provincials proceeded therefore to Breed's hill; but were prevented going to work till near twelve o'clock at night, when they purfued their business with the utmost diligence and alacrity, so that by the dawn of day they had thrown up a finall redoubt, about eight rods square. Such was the extraordinary silence which reigned among them, that they were not heard by the British on board their vetsels in the neighbouring waters. The fight of the works was the first notice that the Lively man of war had of them, when the captain began firing upon them about four in the morning. The guns called the town of Boston, the camp and the fleet to behold a novelty which was little expected. The prospect obliged the British generals to alter the plan which they meant to execute the next day. They grew weary of being cooped up in Boston; and had refolved upon making themselves masters of Dorchester heights, and fecuring the elbow room which general Burgoyne proposed enjoying. But the present provincial movement prevented the expedition. They were now called to attempt possessing themselves of Breed's hill: on which the provincials continued working, notwithstanding a heavy fire from the enemy's ships, a number of floating batteries, and a fortification upon Copp's hill in Boston, directly opposite to the little American redoubt. It is called Copp's hill, though the original name was Cope's hill, from the name of the first owner. An incessant shower of shot and bombs was rained by the batteries upon the American works, and yet but one man was killed. The Americans continued laboring indefatigably till they had thrown up a small breast-work, extending from the east fide of the redoubt to the bottom of the hill, but were prevented completing it by the intolerable fire of the enemy. By some unaccountable error, the detachment swhich had been working for hours, was neither relieved, nor supplied with refreshment, but was left to engage under these difadvantages.

Between twelve and one o'clock, and the day exceeding hot, a number of boats and barges, filled with regular troops from Bollon, approach Charlestown. The men are landed at Moreton's point. They consist of four battalions, ten companies of the grenadiers, and ten of light infantry, with a proportion of field artillery, but by some oversight their spare cartridges are much too big for them, so that when the Americans are at length forced from their lines, there is not a round of artillery cartridges remaining. Major general Howe and brigadier general Pigot, have the command. The troops form, and remain in that position, till joined by a fecond detachment of light infantry and grenadier companies, a battalion of the land forces, and a battalion of marines, making in the whole near upon 3000 men. Generals Clinton and Burgovne take their stand upon Copp's hill to observe and contemplate the bloody and destructive operations, that are now commencing. The regulars form in two lines, and advance deliberately, frequently halting to give time for the artillery to fire, but it is not well ferved. The light infantry are directed to force the left point of the breaft-work, and to take the American line in flank. The grenadiers advance to attack in front, supported by two battalions, while the left, under general Pigot, inclines to the right of the American line. One or two of the continental regiments had been posted in Charlestown; but afterward removed to prevent their being cut off by a fudden attack; fo that the British are not hurt in the least by any musketry from thence, whatever may hereaster be pretended; neither do generals Clinton and Burgoyne perceive any *, though properly flationed for observing all that passes. General Gage had for fome time resolved upon burning the town, when once any works were raifed by the Americans upon the hills belonging to it +: and while the British are advancing nearer and nearer to the attack, orders come to Copp's hill for executing the resolution; soon after a carcals is discharged, which sets fire to an old house near the ferry way; the fire spreads, and most of the place is inflantly in flames. The houses at the eastern end of Charlestown are fired by men landed from the boats. regulars derive no advantage from the smoke of the conflagration, for the wind fuddenly flifting, carries it another way, fo that they have not the cover of it in their approach. The provincials have not a rifleman among them, not one being yet arrived from the fouthward; nor have they any rifle guns; they have only common mulkets, nor are these in general furnished with bayonets; but then they are almost all marksmen, being accustomed to sporting of one kind or other from their youth. A number of the Malfachusetts troops are in the redoubt, and the part of the breaft-work nearest it. The left of the breaftwork, and the open ground firetching beyond its point to the water fide, through which there has not been the opportunity of carrying the work, is occupied partly by the Massachusetts forces, and partly by the Connecticut, under capt. Nolton of Athford, and the New-Hampshire under colonel Stark.

* General Burgoyne's Letter.

[†] Phis retolution was affigured by a near female relation of the general, to a gentlewoman with whom she had been acquainted at school, as a reason why the other, upon obtaining a pass to quit Boston, should not tarry at her tather's (Mr. Cary's) house in Charlestown.

By the direction of the officers, the troops upon the open ground pull up the post and rail fence, and carrying it forward to another of the fame kind, and putting fome newly mowed grass between them, form a slight defence in some parts. General Warren joins the Maffachusetts forces in one place, and general Pomeroy in another. General Putnam is bufily engaged in aiding and encouraging, here and there as the case requires. The provincials are impatiently waiting the attack of the enemy. What scenes now offer to our view! Here, a large and noble town, confisting of about 300 dwelling houses, and near upon 200 other buildings, in one great blaze, burning with amazing fury, being chiefly timber, with but little exception. The only place of worthip, a large commodious meeting house, by its aspiring steeple, forms a pyramid of fire above the rest. There, in Boston, the steeples, houses, and heights, are covered with the inhabitants, and those of the military, whose duty does not call them elfewhere. Yonder, the hills around the country, and the fields, that afford a fafe and distinct view of the momentous contest, are occupied by Americans of all ages and orders. The British move on steadily, but slowly, instead of using a quick step; which gives the provincials the advantage of taking furer and cooler aim. These reserve their fire, till the regulars come within ten or twelve rods, when they began a furious discharge of fmall arms, by which the enemy is arrested, and which they return for some time without advancing a step. The stream of American fire is fo inceffant, and does fuch execution, that the regulars retreat in disorder, and with great precipitation toward the place of landing, and some seek refuge even in their boats. The officers are feen by the spectators on the opposite fhore, running down to them, using the most passionate gestures, and pushing them forward with their swords. At length they are rallied; but march with apparent reluctance up to the intrenchment. The Americans again referve their fire, till the enemy come within five or fix rods; then discharge their well-directed pieces, and put them a fecond time to flight. Such is the loss already fustained, that several of the officers say, " It is downright butchery to lead the men on afreth against the lines." Rut British honor is at stake, these must therefore be carried. neral Howe and the officers double their exertions. General Clinton perceiving how the army is staggered, passes over, without waiting for orders, and joins them in time to be of fervice. The united and strenuous efforts of the different officers are again fucceisful, notwithstanding the men discover an almost insuperable aversion to renewing the attack. The Americans are in want of powder, fend for a supply, but can procure none; for there is but a barrel and a half in the magazine. This deficiency disables them from making the same defence as before; while the British reap a further advantage by bringing some cannon to bear so as to rake the inside of the breast-work from end to end; upon which the provincials retreat within their fort. The regular army now makes a decisive push. The fire from the ships and batteries and field artillery is redoubled. The officers in the rear goad on the soldiers, and the redoubt is attacked on three sides at once. The provincials are of necessity ordered to retreat; but they delay, and keep the enemy at bay for some time with the butt end of their muskets, till the redoubt is half silled with regulars; the works of which are easily mounted, a few hours

While these operations are going forward at the breast-work and redoubt, the light infantry are engaged in attempting to force the left point of the former, through the space between that and the water, that they may take the American line in flank. They exhibit repeated proofs of undaunted courage; but the refistance they meet with is as formidable and fatal as what their fellow foldiers experience in the other quarter. Here the provincials also, by command, referve their fire till the enemy is near, and then pour in their shot upon the infantry with such a true direction and amazing fuccess, as to mow them down in ranks. Some of them are flightly guarded by the rail fences abovementioned; but others are quite exposed, and more than is needful; and the regulars will have no reason in future to charge them with fighting unfairly, because of their using defences, not formed by military rules, and workmen. The engagement between the two parties is kept up with great resolution; but the well-ain.ed fire of the Americans does aftonishing execution; and the strenuous exertions of the regulars cannot compel them to retreat, till they observe that their main body has left the hill: when they give way, but with more regularity than could be expected from troops who have been no longer under discipline, and in general never before faw an engagement.

The courage and conduct of the provincials that opposed the light infantry, saved their co-patriots, who were overpowered and obliged to retreat from the fort; and who must otherwise have been cut off, as the enemy, but for such opposition, would have been instantly upon the back of the redoubt. While these brave men were retreating, general Warren was shot in the back

The retreat of the Americans lay over the neck, which joined the peninfula of Charlestown to the main land; and as the Glafgow man of war and two floating batteries were so stationed as to rake every part of it with her shot, it was feared that they would be cut off after all, but they retired with very little loss. The incessant fire kept up by the ship and batteries across the neck from the beginning of the engagement, prevented any considerable reinforcements getting to the hill; but this was owing more to the cowardice of some provincial officers than to the execution of the shot.

The number of Americans engaged, including those who dared to cross the neck and join them, amounted only to fifteen hundred; but the unengaged, who appeared in various parts, did, by their different movements, lead many of the Boston spectators to apprehend, at that distance, that they consisted of some

It was feared by the Americans, that the British troops would push the advantage they had gained, and march immediately to head quarters at Cambridge, about two miles distant; and in no state of defence. But they advanced no further than to Bunker's-hill, of which they possessed themselves the night of their retreat from Lexington; and here they threw up works for their The provincials did the fame upon Prospect-hill in front of them, about half way to Cambridge. The apprehensions of each side in regard to the other appeared to be fimilar. Both were guarding against an attack, in hopes of preventing it. Had the refolution of either led on immediately to a fresh engagement, the day would probably have been far more decifive. But the lofs of the peninfula damped the courage of the Americans, and the loss of men depressed the spirits of the British. A veteran officer, who was at the battles of Dettingen and Minden, and at feveral others in Germany, has faid, that for the time the engagement lafted, and the number of men in it, he never knew any thing equal it. There was a continued sheet of fire from the provincials for near half an hour, and the action was hot for about double that period. In this short space, the loss of the British, according to general Gage, amounted to 1054, of whom 226 were killed, of these 19 were commission. ed officers, including a lieutenant-colonel, 2 majors, and 7 cap-

^{*} Mr. afterward major Winflow, of the American artillery, (who was perfonally acquainted with the general, and croffed over from Boston to the place of action, after the battle, and narrowly surveyed the body) related his being to shot, and the hand's being bloody as if by the wound.

tains; 70 other officers were wounded. Among those more geherally regretted, were lieutenant-colonel Abercromby, and major Pitcairn, who occasioned the first shedding of blood at Lexington. The battle of Quebec in the late war, with all its glory, and the vaftness of the consequences it produced, was not so destructive to the British officers as this affair of an American intrenchment, the work of only a few hours. Even at the battle of Minden, where the British regiments sustained the force of the whole French army for a confiderable time, the number of officers killed, including two who foon died of their wounds, was only 13, and the wounded remaining 66: their whole loss in killed was 291, in wounded 1037, together 1328*. That the officers suffered fo, must be imputed partly to their being aimed at by the Americans; and this may account for most of those, who were near the person of general Howe, being slain or disabled. It was a wonder, that the general himself escaped. The men, habituated to take fight, would naturally aim at the officers, without expecting or waiting for orders, from an apprehension that much confusion would follow upon their dropping. Gage's account of the killed and wounded is large; but does not equal by much what has been given to one of the felectmen of Boston, remaining in town, by a fergeant who declared he had feen the returns from the proper perfons, the total of which was 1325. The light infantry and grenadiers, the moment they presented themselves, lost three-fourths of their men, and in a few instances more. Of one company only three or five, and of another only fourteen escaped. A number of tories served as volunteers, feveral of whom were killed. The unexpected relistance of the Americans called forth all the courage and exertions of the British officers, which did not fail upon the occasion: but whatever commendations they are entitled to upon that account, the Americans are certainly entitled to a proper portion of the like for having made the fame necessary. These have now wiped away the reproaches unjustly cast upon them by their enemies in Britain. Let fuch praise the spirited conduct of general Howe and of general Clinton; and attribute in a great measure the success of the day to the firmness and gallantry of general Pigot; but let them no more pronounce the colonists cowards, who will fly at the very fight of a grenadier's cap. The British, beside gaining the peninfula, took thirty wounded prisoners, and five pieces of cannon out of fix.

The lofs of the provincials has been trifling. The killed and dead of their wounds are 139, the wounded living 278, and the missing 36, in all 453. They deeply regret the deaths of major general Warren, of colonel Gardner of Cambridge, of lieutenant-colonel Parker, of Clemsford, who was wounded, taken prisoner, and perished in Boston jail; of major Moore and mafor M'Clany, who were the only officers of distinction that they loft. But the death of general Warren will be most severely felt, and occasions the greatest forrow. His enemies bear testi-mony to his importance, by triumpling at his fall, and rating it as better to them than 500 men. Neither refentment, nor interested views, but a regard to the liberties of his country, induced him to oppose the measures of government. He stepped forward into public view, not that he might be noted and admired for a patriotic spirit, but because he was a patriot. He was a gentleman of integrity, in whom the friends of liberty could confide. The foundness of his judgment enabled him to give good advice in private confultations. His powers of speech and reafoning commanded respect, and gained him influence in the proyincial congress. He aimed not at a separation from, but a coalition with Britain, upon a full redrefs of grievances, and a reciprocal intercourse of interests and affection. He was valued in private life for his engaging manners, and as a physician for his professional abilities. The death of an amiable consort had made his life of the greatest importance to his children; he was willing however to risk it in the service of the public. His intrepidity and zeal for the cause he had espoused; together with the electing voice of the provincial congress, induced him to enter upon the military line. Within four days after his appointment to a major-generalship, he fell a noble facrifice to the natural rights of mankind. He was of a middling fize, and of a lowish flature. The ladies pronounced him handsome.

The tories exulted upon the acquisition of the peninsula of Charlestown; but the experienced officers in the British service thought the advantage too dearly purchased, and their counternances became gloomy upon the occasion. The reason for it has been increasing from the frequent and multiplied deaths of the wounded. These have suffered greatly for want of fresh provisions and other supplies, which the country alone could furnish; many would have survived, had they been as well nursed as the wounded Americans out of Boston, of whom but sew have dien; with regard to the wounded prisoners in town, there are com-

The burning of Charleslown, now a heap of ruins, though before the present troubles a place of great trade, has not had the least tendency toward discouraging the provincials from prosecuting their opposition to ministerial measures, whatever might have Vol. 1. 2 A been been the intention of general Gage. It has not excited fear, but refentment, wrath and execration. Such military executions may diffrefs and impoverifh, but will not fubdue the coloniffs. They might answer in the old world; but are not calculated for the new.

In the opinion of many, general Howe was chargeable with a capital error in landing and attacking as he did. It might originate from too great a confidence in the fores he commanded, and in too contemptuous an opinion of the enemy he had to encounter. He certainly might have entrapped the provincials by fanding on the narrowest part of Charlestown neck, under the fire of the sloating batteries and ships of war. Here he might have stationed and fortissed his army, and kept up an open communication with Boston by a water-carriage, which he would have commanded through the aid of the navy, on each side of the peninsula. Had he attempted this manceuver, the provincials on observing it, must have made a rapid retreat from Breed'shill, to have escaped having his troops in their rear, and being enclosed. It is said, that general Clinton proposed it. The rejection of the proposal, if really made, has greatly weakened the British army, and probably prevented the ruin of the American.

The colonists may regret, that general Howe conquered at Breed's hill; but had the provincials driven him back into Boston, it might have been of far greater detriment to the common cause, than the prefent fituation of affairs. The Maffachusetts colony yould searce have been easy under the appointment of general Washington to the chief command, had general Ward been crowned with the laurels of victory. The victory; as it stands, will make the appointment go down eafily, and prevent objections. Not only fo, but it has occasioned Gage's dividing his army to fecure the conquest he has made. He has another post to maintain, which will employ fo great a force, as to cramp his future operations. Belides, had the British been driven back into Bollon, they might have removed to New-York, which would have answered their general design better than remaining ecoped up in their prefent position. In that city and colony they would have had many more friends. There it is that the miniftry have their greatest influence. That would have been the fecurest place for the troops, and where they might have procured those supplies from the country which they are now deprived of. By early reinforcements from Great-Britain, it might have been made to strong a post, as to have commanded the North-river, and cut off the communication between the colonies which that Laparates. The

The provincials have been indefatigable in throwing up works, and fecuring the most exposed parts of their lines with slrong redoubts covered with artillery. They had ftrangely neglected fortifying the paffage from the neck to the post of Roxbury, and even the post itself; but fince the Breed's-hill battle they have compensated for the defect; and to make their defence the more perfect, have pulled down a very good house, (on a point where the road coming from Boston divides) which was built by governor Dudley, and to whose false politics many are ready to ascribe the early origin of those designs which the ministry are now endeavouring to accomplish. The ministerial army abound in military flores and artillery; and are not sparing in throwing shells, and fupporting a great cannonade upon the provincial works, especially at Roxbury. It was terrifying at first to raw troops, who not being accustomed to, expected to fusier greatly by it. Some damage has been done among the houses in the street, one or two have been burnt, and a man or two killed. But the provincials stationed there have found by experience, that though the noise is great, the damage is trifling, and therefore despise it. They are so hardened by repeated firing, that a cannonading is no more minded than a common thunder shower.

Breed's-hill engagement excited fresh desires in the inhabitants of Boston to leave the town. The selectmen had given repeated affurances to general Gage, that they had delivered up their arms according to agreement: in order to justify his detaining them, June 19.] he issued a proclamation, in which he declared, that he had full proof of the contrary, and that many had been perfidious in that respect, and had secreted great numbers. few might fecrete their sporting guns, or curious arms. No doubt however is to be made, but that the greatest part, or nearly all the training arms were delivered up. The impartial world will scarcely acquit him of having been guilty of a notorious breach of faith, even admitting his own plea. If individuals had not complied with the propofal of delivering up their arms; yet as the community had done it, the innocent were entitled to all the benefits of the agreement. Numbers were afterward allowed to quit the town, but not to take their effects, though that was flipulated in the beginning; the allowance however was thought to be owing to a defire of reducing the confumption of provifi-

The day the proclamation appeared, the chiefs and warriors of the Oneida tribe of Indians, directed the following speech to governor Trumbull, to be communicated by him to the four New-England provinces:

" As

"As my younger brothers of the New-England Indians, who have fettled in the vicinity, are now going down to vifit their friends, and to move up parts of their families that were left behind—with this belt by them, I open the road wide, clearing it of all obstacles, that they may visit their friends, and return to their fettlements here in peace.

"We Oneidas are induced to this measure on account of the disagreeable situation of affairs that way; and we hope by the help of God, they may return in peace.—We earnestly recom-

" Now we more immediately address you our brother, the governor, and the chiefs of New-England.

"Brothers!—We have heard of the unhappy differences, and great contention between you and Old England.—We wonder greatly, and are troubled in our minds.

"Brothers!—Posses your minds in peace respecting us Indians.—We cannot intermeddle in this dispute between two brothers.—The quarrel seems to be unnatural.—You are two brothers of one blood.—We are unwilling to join on either side in such a contest, for we bear an equal affection to both you Old and New-England,—Should the great king of England apply to us for aid—we shall deny him.—If the colonies apply—we will refuse.—The present situation of you two brothers is new and strange to us. We Indians cannot find, nor recollect in the traditions of our ancestors, the like case, or a similar instance,

"Brothers!—For these reasons possess your minds in peace, and take no umbrage, that we Indians refuse joining in the contest .- We are for peace.

"Brothers!—Was it an alien, a foreign nation, who had flruck you, we should look into the matter.—We hope, through the wife government and good pleasure of God, your distresses may be foon removed, and the dark clouds be dispersed.

"Brothers!—As we have declared for peace, we defire you will not apply to our Indian brethren in New-England for affiftance.—Let us Indians be all, of one mind, and live with one another; and you white people fettle your own disputes betwixt yourselves.

"Brothers!—we have now declared our minds—please to write to us, that we may know yours. We the Sacheins and warriors, and semale governesses of Oneida, send our love to you brother, governor, and all the other chiefs in New-England."

My friend, the Rev. Mr. Samuel Kirkland, a missionary among the Oneidas, and who understands the language, interpreted and wrote the above. He tells me, that the Indian names of men, rivers and places, have often special meanings, alluding to events or qualities, as is much the case in the Hebrew language. The Indians are very deliberate in their speeches, often pausing, to engage a closer attention to what they deliver. They have a prevailing species of politeness, frequently wanting in the conversation of civilized Europeans, too apt to pronounce them, savages and barbarians. They give close attention to the person addressing them. They do not interrupt him while speaking, but wait till he has finished; and consider it as great rudeness to be interrupted. In their councils every one is heard with patience in all that he has to say: prosound filence reigns among the audience to the exclusion of all disturbance, and there

The above Indian speech feems to refer to one which had been delivered to the provincial congress eleven days before, by the Stockbridge delegate, being the answer of the Indians dwelling there to a melfage of the former congress. This answer was, " Brothers! we have heard you fpeak by your letter-we thank you for it-we now make answer. "Brothers! you remember when you first came over the great waters, I was great and you was little, very small. I then took you in for a friend, and kept you under my arms, fo that no one might injure you: fince that time we have ever been true friends: there has never been any quarrel between us. But now our conditions are changed. You are become great and tall.—You reach to the clouds.—You are feen all round the world, I am become finall, very little.-I am not fo high as your heel. Now you take care of me, and I look to you for protection. " Brothers! I am forry to hear of this great quarrel between you and Old England. It appears that blood must soon be shed to end this quarrel. We never till this day understood the foundation of this quarrel between you and the country you came from. Brothers! Whenever I see your blood running, you will foon find me about you to revenge my brother's blood. Although I am low and very fmall, I will gripe hold of your enemy's heel, that he cannot run fo fast, and so light, as if he had nothing at his heels.

" Brothers! You know I am not fo wife as you are, therefore I ask your advice in what I am now going to fay-I have been thinking before you come to action to take a run to the westward, and feel the mind of my Indian brethren the fix nations, and know how they stand, whether they are on your side, or for your enemies. If I find they are against you, I will try to turn their minds. I think they will liften to me, for they have always looked this way for advice concerning all important news that comes from the rifing of the fun. If they hearken to me, you will not be afraid of any danger from behind you .-However their minds are affected, you shall foon know by me. Now I think I can do you more fervice in this way than by marching off immediately to Boston, and slaying there, it may be a great while before blood runs. Now as I faid you are wifer than I, I leave this for your consideration, whether I come down immediately, or wait till I hear fome blood is spilled.

"Brothers! I would not have you think by this, that we are falling back from our engagements. We, are ready to do any thing for your relief, and thall be guided by your counfel.

"Brothers one thing I ask of you, if you fend for me to fight that you will let me fight in my own Indian way. I am not used to fight English fashion, therefore you must not expect I can train like your men. Only point out to me where your enemies keep, and that is all I shall want to know."

This speech was delivered the eleventh of April, 1775, by the chief Sachem of the Moheakounuch tribe of Indians, reliding at Stockbridge, after fitting near two days in council. The provincial congress ordered the following reply on the eighth of June, viz.

"Brothers! We this day, by the delegate from Stockbridge, first heard of your friendly answer to our speech to you by capt. William Goodrich, which answer we are told you made to us immediately by a letter, which we have not yet received—We

"Brothers! You fay that you was once great, but that you are now little; and that we were once little, but are now great. The fupreme Spirit orders these things.—Whether we are little or great, let us keep the path of friendship clear, which our fathers made, and in which we have both travelled to this time.—The friends of the wicked counsellors of our king, sell upon us, and shed some blood, soon after we spake to you last by our letter —But we with a fmall twig killed fo many, and frightened them fo much, that they have flut themselves up in our great town called Boston, which they have made strong. We have now made our hatchets, and all our instruments of war sharp and bright. All the chief counsellors, who live on this side the great water, are fitting in the grand council-house in Philadelphia, when they give the word, we shall all as one man fall on, and drive our enemies out of their strong fort, and sollow them tilt they shall take their hands out of our pouches, and let us sit in our council-house, as we used to do, and as our fathers did in old times.

"Brothers! Though you are small, yet you are wife. Use your wisdom to help us. If you think it best, go and smoke your pipe with your Indian brothers toward the setting of the fun, and tell them of all you hear and all you see; and let us know what their wise men say. If some of your young men should have a mind to see what we are doing here, let them come down and tarry among our warriors. We will provide for them.

" Brothers! When you have any trouble, come and tell it to us, and we will help you."

To captain Solomon Ahhaunnauwaumut, chief Sachem of the Moheahounuck Indians.

[June 20.] The Massachusetts congress wrote to the several towns, that the continental congress resolved on the 9th instant, that no obedience being due to the act of parliament for altering the charter of the colony, &c, and directed them to elect one or more freeholders to represent them in a great and general court, to be held upon the 19th of July at Watertown. They also chose colonel Heath major general, in the place of the late

[June 22.] Before general Washington left Philadelphia, the continental congress chose by ballot eight brigadier generals, Seth Pomeroy, efq; of the Massachusetts colony, the first; Richard Montgomery, esq; of New-York, the second; David Wooster, esq; of Connecticut, the third; William Heath, esq; of the Massachusetts, the fourth; John Spencer, esq; of Connecticut, the fifth; John Thomas esq; of the Massachusetts, the sixth; John Sullivan, esq; of Hampshire, the seventh; and Nathaniel Greene, esq; of Rhode-Island, the eighth; and resolved, that the officers in the army should receive their new commissions through the hands of the general.

The same day they resolved, "That a sum not exceeding 2,000,000 of Spanish inilled dollars be emitted by the congress in bills of credit, for the desence of America; and that THE

TWELVE

TWELVE CONFEDERATED COLONIES (thus they are termed) be pledged for the redemption of the bills." This is an expedient, without which they are not able to profecute the defence of America, as they have neither money nor revenues to recur to. Some few of the delegates know, from what has happened in the northern colonies, that the effects of a paper emiffion will be bad, when it becomes plentiful; has no flable fund for the speedy redemption of it; and cannot be exchanged in the common intercourse of business for specie or specie value. But the risk of smaller and personal evils must take place rather than the total subversion of the rights of the united colonies beendangered. No one delegate therefore opposed the present expedient. As the news of Breed's-hill battle had reached them. by means of a quick conveyance, they refolved, "That Pennfylvania raife two more companies of riflemen, and that the whole eight be formed into a battalion, to be commanded by fuch officers as shall be recommended by the affembly or convention of

Measures being pursued in North-Carolina to defeat the American affociation, they refolved, [June 26.] "That it be recommended to all in that colony, who wish well to the liberties of America, to affociate for the defence of American liberty, and to imbody themselves as militia; under proper officers; and That in case the affembly or convention of that colony shall think it absolutely necessary for the support of the American affociation and fafety of the colony, to raife a thousand men, this congrefs will confider them as an American army, and provide for their pay." They have gone too far to recede from the use of force, and so must employ it wherever wanted to secure their friends, till the point in dispute with Great-Britain is settled .-The zeal, activity, and unanimity of those Pennsylvanians in general, whose principles admit of hostile resistance, have superceded the necessity of fuch like resolutions in respect to them. The Philadelphia militia have been formed into three battalions for fome time; and in the beginning of the month, these confilling of 1500 men, an artillery company of 150, with two twelve and four fix pound brass field pieces; a troop of light horse, several companies of light infantry, rangers, and rislemen, in the whole about two thousand, marched to the common, and having joined in brigade went through the manual exercise, firing and manœuvres (with a dexterity fearcely to be expected from fo fhort a practice) in the presence of the members of the continental congress, and several thousand spectators. A confiderable number even of the quakers have joined in the military affociation of the city. There is one company composed intirely of gentlemen belonging to that religious denomination of people. They are convinced that weapons of war may be lawfully employed in defending their national rights and liberties, though they are averfe to all offensive operations to gratify ambition covetousness or revenge. The Pennsylvanians are careful to order the militia of the counties to be frequently exercised. The colony has put on the most martial appearance. About the beginning of June a committee of congress drew up a declaration, containing an offer to Great-Britain, "That the colonies would not only continue to grant extraordinary aids in time of war, but also, if allowed a free commerce, pay into the finking fund fuch a fum annually for one hundred years, as should be more than sufficient in that time, if faithfully applied, to extinguish all the present debts of Britain. Or, provided this was not accepted, that to remove the groundless jealous of Britain, that the colonies aimed at independence, and an abolition of the navigation act, which, in truth, they had never intended: and also, to avoid all future disputes about the right of making that and other acts for regulating their commerce for the general benefit, they would enter into a covenant with Britain, that fine should fully possess and exercise that right for one hundred years to come." This declaration was never entered upon the minutes of congress, for before that could be done, they received the account of the two restraining acts, which proved its ruin*.

They refolved, "That in case any agent of the ministry shall induce the Indian tribes, or any of them, to commit actual hosfilities against these colonies, or to enter into an offensive alliance with the British troops, thereupon the colonies ought to avail themselves of an alliance with such Indian nations as will enter into the same, to oppose such British troops and their Indian respectively.

[July 2.] General Washington, accompanied by general Lee and other gentlemen, arrived at Cambridge. A committee from the Massachusetts congress repaired to Springfield, about a hundred miles from Boston, on the way to Connecticut, there to receive them, and provide proper escorts for them from thence to the army. They had been treated with the highest honors in every place through which they passed; and been escorted by large detachments of volunteers, composed of gentlemen. The general was addressed by the provincial congress of New-York as he came along. They expressed their joy in his appointment; and toward the close faid, "We have the fullest assurances, that whenever this important contest shall be decided by that fondest will of each American foul, an accommodation with our mother country, you will cheerfully refign the important deposit committed into your hands, and re-assume the character of our worthiest citizen." The general, after declaring his gratitude for the regard shown him, added, "Be affured, that every exertion of my worthy colleagues and myfelf, will be extended to the re-effablishment of peace and harmony, between the mother country and these colonies: as to the fatal but necessary operations of war, when we affumed the foldier, we did not lay afide the citizen, and we shall most sincerely rejoice with you, in that happy hour, when the establishment of American liberty, on the most firm and solid foundations, shall enable us to return to our private flations, in the bosom of a free, peaceful and happy country. Since his arrival he has been addressed in the most affectionate and respectful manner by the Massachusetts congress. You must have a recourse to the public prints for his whole anfwer, but take the beginning for a specimen, "Gentlemen, your kind congratulations on my appointment and arrival, demand my warmest acknowledgments and will ever be retained in grateful remembrance. In exchanging the enjoyments of domestic life for the duties of my prefent honorable but arduous station, I only emulate the virtue and public spirit of the whole province of Massachusetts-Bay, which, with a firmness, and patriotism without example in modern history, has facrificed all the comforts of focial and political life, in support of the rights of mankind, and the welfare of our common country. My highest ambition is, to be the happy inflrument of vindicating those rights, and to fee this devoted province again restored to peace, liberty, and fafety." This paragraph was extremely gratifying to the persons to whom it was directed.

The general began to give out the congressional commissions, but suspended all further delivery when general Putnam had received his, upon learning that the appointments so degraded general Thomas by ranking him far below his juniors in office, that he could not with any propriety continue in the army on that footing, but must decline serving the country in a military capacity. The several generals regretted the mistake, and wished to have the difficulty removed. Washington acquainted the congress with it, upon which they appointed him first brigadier general, in the room of Seth Pomeroy, who had never acted under his commission, and was too far advanced in life.

General

General Greene testified his regard for the commander in chief, by addressing him on his appointment and arrival, and by declaring the fatisfaction he should feel in ferving under his command. He was joined in the address by the officers of his brigade. If other generals and officers have done the like, it has not come to my knowledge. This singular instance of respect must make a favorable and lasting impression on the mind of general Washington. The general, after a careful inspection, could not estimate the continental army at more than 14,500 men capable of duty, who had to defend an extent of at least twelve miles. But fuch has been the precaution and guard exercifed on every fide of Boston, that the regiment of light cavalry arrived there, has not fet foot beyond the garrison, and ferves only to create new wants, and to increase the inconveniencies of the people as well as of the British army. The hay growing upon the islands, together with the sheep and cattle remaining upon them, proved an object of necessary attention: but the continentals possessing a number of whale boats, and being masters of the shore and inlets, were successful in burning, destroying, or carrying off those essential articles of supply, notwithstanding the number of British ships of war and armed veffels.

[July 11.] A party of 500 continentals went at night from the Roxbury camp, and getting into 65 whale boats, proceeded to Long-Island, and brought off 15 of the enemy, about 20 head of cattle, and 100 sheep. The next day [July 12.] they went again, and burnt the hay, &c. when there was considerable fighting between them and the British boats and schooners. About fix days after, a number burnt the light-house on an island, nine miles below Boston, at the entrance of the harbour, though a

Since the arrival of the continental generals, the regulations of the camp have been greatly for the better. Before, there was little emulation among the officers; and the foldiers were lazy, diforderly and dirty. The freedom to which the New-Englanders have alway been accustomed, makes them impatient of controul, and renders it extremely difficult to establish that discipline so essential to troops, in order to success. Discipline will not inspire cowards with courage, but it will make them sight. The army has been thrown into three grand divisions: general Ward commands the right wing at Roxbury; general Lee the left at Prospect-hill; and the centre, in which is included a corps de reserve, is commanded by general Washington. Adjutant general Gates has been of special service in arranging the army. His military skill in those matters has supplied plied the want of it in others. The public cannot be too thankful for this benefit. Every officer and private begins to know his place and duty. Method and punctuality are growing into use, and becoming habitual. The troops will shortly have the mechanism and movements as well as the name of an army.

The continental lines are fo strengthened, the number of redoubts and mounted cannon so many, as to make an attack upon Cambridge, or a penetration into the country that way impracticable. The British, according to the intelligence obtained from Boston, have lost by death, including the slain, and those who died of their wounds, near upon 2500, since the nineteenth

General Washington acquainted congress, that the allowance of provision to the troops, and the mode of delivering it out, are different from what has fallen within his experience, and must prove very wasteful and expensive. The high pay of the foldiers *, which greatly exceeds that of the British, will make a more economical plan necessary. But the most painful information he had to communicate, was that of the want of powder. [August 13.] He discovered, that the whole stock of the army at Roxbury, Cambridge, and the adjacent places, confifted but of ninety barrels or thereabout: that there were no more than 36 in the Massachusetts magazine, which with the stock of New-Hampshire, Rhode-Island, and Connecticut, made but 9937lb. not more than nine rounds a man. The continentals remained in this deflitute condition for about a fortnight or more, till the Jersey committee of Elizabethtown, upon receiving the alarming news, fent on a few tons, which they were obliged to do with the greatest privacy, lest the fears of their own people, had it been known, should have stopt it for their own use, in case of an emergency. During this interval, the fcarcity of powder became a camp talk; and a deferter carried the account of it to Boffon. The British dared not to rely upon the intelligence, having been so often deceived. Beside, though they had met with unexpected proofs of American courage, yet they could not believe the colonists possessed of such consumuate assurance, as to continue investing them, while so destitute of ammunition. They rather suspected a deep laid plot to infnare them.

All the riflemen are arrived in camp. The congressional refolve, for raising eight hundred, palled on the fourteenth of June, and on the twenty-second they agreed upon two additional companies of Pennsylvanians. No orders were dispatched before the fourteenth, and the expresses had to ride three or four hundred miles to the persons directed to raise them. The men to the amount of 1430, were raifed, completely armed, most with their own rifles, and accoutred for the field with fuch expedition, as to join the army at Cambridge, one company on the 25th of July, the rest on the 5th and 7th of August; all had marched from four to feven hundred miles. The whole bufiness was performed in less than two months, without a farthing advanced from the continental treasury.

[July 6.] They agreed to a Declaration, in behalf of the colomes fetting forth the causes and necessity of their taking up arms. After enumerating the injuries they had fuffered, they reprobated the principles of lord North's conciliatory plan, without naming it, and faid, " Parliament adopted an infidious manœuvre calculated to divide us, to establish a perpetual auction of taxations where colony should bid against colony, all of them uninformed what ranfom would redeem their lives." They went on to mention the perfidy of general Gage in breaking his agreement with the inhabitants of Boston—the wanton burning of Charlestown, and a considerable number of houses in other places—the seizure of their ships and vessels—the instigation of the Canadians and Indians to fall upon them. They then faid, "We are reduced to the alternative of choosing an unconditional submission to the tyranny of irritated ministers, or refistance by force.—The latter is our choice.-We have counted the cost of this contest, and find nothing fo dreadful as voluntary flavery.-Honor, justice and humanity, forbid us tamely to lurrender that freedom which we received from our gallant ancestors, and which our innocent posterity have a right to receive from us. We cannot endure the infamy and guilt of religning succeeding generations to that wretchedness which inevitably awaits them, if we basely entail hereditary bondage upon them."

" Our cause is just. Our union is perfect. Our internal refources are great, and if necessary, foreign assistance is undoubtedly attainable." This intimation of foreign affiftance, was not founded upon any private information, but flowed folely from the perfualion, that one or more foreign powers will readily embrace the opportunity of a fixed breach between Great-Britain and the colonies, to weaken the power of the first by affisting the last. But that they might not by their declaration, disquiet the minds of their friends and fellow fubjects, congress affured them, that they meant not to dissolve that union, which had so long and fo happily subsisted between them and Britain. concluded thus, "With an humble confidence in the mercies of the supreme and impartial Judge and Ruler of the universe, we most devoutly implore his divine goodness to protect us happily through this great conslict, to dispose our adversaries to reconciliation on reasonable terms, and thereby to relieve the empire from the calamities of civil war."

The declaration of congress has been read with religious folemnity by the chaplains, to the different bodies of the American army about Boston, and received with loud acclamations by the troops, and the numerous spectators who were present upon the occasion. The same day that congress agreed upon the declaration, they resolved upon a letter of thanks to the lord mayor, alderinen, and livery of the city of London, for their virtuous and spirited opposition to the oppressive and ruinous system of colony administration adopted by the British ministry.

[July 8.] The petition to the king being ready, it was figned by the members present. It is a decent, dutiful, and truly filial petition, and deferves to be written in letters of gold, for the fentiments it breathes toward the parent state. Had money been wanting to have purchased it, it would have been wisdom to have bought it at any price. If properly received, it may be made the basis of an internal compact, between Great-Britain and her American colonies, which may to all ages bid defiance to the intrigues of France, and the murmurs of rotten-hearted men either in Britain or America. The fincerity of it may be called into question by the ministry. Let them then put the fincerity of it to the test, by promoting a compliance with the contents; and fo over reach those individual delegates, who may wish a continuance of the present quarrel. The colonies as yet desire no more than a redress of grievances, and security against a repetition of them. They most ardently long for a firm and indisfoluble union with the parent state upon these grounds; Thus is it with the army. It is the wish of general Washington particularly and fuch is its reasonableness, that he hopes and expects, that the contest will be shortly terminated, so as to admit of his eating his next Christmas dinner, at his own delightful residence on Mount Vernon.

The fame day the congress agreed to an Address to the inhabitants of Great-Britain, In it they said, "We have again prefented an humble and dutiful petition to our sovereign; and to remove every imputation of obstinacy, have requested his majesty to direct some mode by which the united applications of his faithful colonists may be improved into a happy and permanent reconciliation. We are willing to treat on such terms as can alone render an accommodation lasting: and we slatter ourselves, that our pacific endeavours will be attended with a removal of ministerial troops, and a repeal of those laws, of the operation of which we complain, on the one part, and a difbanding of our army, and a diffolution of our commercial affociations on the other." They, after that, infinuated the danger the inhabitants of Britain would be in of loofing their freedom, in case their American brethren were fubdued. The address is intended to conciliate the minds of the inhabitants of Britain, to the measures that the colonists have already taken, or may be oblidged further to take, and to obtain the countenance of the former.

The petition to the king, the address to the inhabitants of Great-Britain, and the letter to the lord mayor, &c. were ordered to be fent under cover to Richard Penn, esq; whom the prefident was to request, in behalf of the congress, to join with the colony agents in prefenting the petition to the king. Mr. Penn

[July 12] The congress agreed upon appointing commissioners to superintend Indian affairs in behalf of the colonies. Proper talks to the Indians were ordered to be prepared, which were reported the next day, [July 13.] and accepted.

[July 18. | The congress resolved to recommend to all ablebodied effective men in each colony, between fixteen and fifty, immediately to form themselves into regular companies of militia; to acquire military skill, and to be well prepared for defence; and that a fourth part of the militia in every colony be felected for minute men, and be ready to march wherever their affistance may be required. It was earneftly recommended to those, who could not conscientiously bear arms in any case, to contribute liberally to the relief of their distressed brethren, and to do all other fervices to their oppressed country, which they could confiftently with their religious principles. They also proposed that each colony should appoint a committee of safety, to direct all matters necessary for the security of their respective colonies, in the recess of their assemblies and conventions; and should make fuch provision by armed vessels or otherwise, as might be judged expedient, for the protection of their harbours and navigation on their sea coasts, against all hostile cutters and ships of war.

[uly 20.] This being the day appointed for the continental fast, congress agreed to meet, and go in a body to divine service, both parts of the day. They requested Mr. Duché to preach before them in the morning, and Dr. Allison in the afternoon. But, before the fervice, they met time enough to read fome dispatches brought by express from general Schuyler; and a letter from the convention of Georgia, fetting forth that that colony had acceded to the general affociation, and appointed delegates to attend

The day was kept at Philadelphia, as the most solemn fast ever held in that city. It was religiously observed throughout the united colonies. The united fynod of New-York and Philadelphia, had published a pastoral letter some time before: it was read on that day, in the churches under their care, which are very numerous. They faid in it, "As the whole continent, with hardly any exception, feem determined to defend their rights by force of arms, it becomes the peculiar duty of those, who profess a willingness to hazard their lives in the cause of liberty, to be prepared for death, which to many must be a certain, and to every one is a possible or probable event. It is well known to you (otherwife it would be impudent thus publicly to profess) that we have not been instrumental in inflaming the minds of the people, or urging them to acts of violence and disorder. Perhaps no instance can be given on so interesting a subject, in which political fentiments have been fo long and fo fully kept from the pulpit, and even malice itself has not charged us with labouring from the prefs; but things are now come to fuch a height, that we do not wish to conceal our opinions as men. Suffer us therefore to exhort you, by affuring you, that there is no army fo formidable as those who are superior to the fear of death. Let therefore every one who, from generofity of spirit, or benevolence of heart, offers himself as a champion in his country's cause, be perfuaded to reverence the Lord of Holts, and walk in the fear of the Prince of the kings of the earth, and then he may, with the most unshaken firmness, expect the issue either in death or victory."

After feveral other exhortations, they offered fix advices, in fubstance as follows: "1st. Let every opportunity be taken to express your attachment to king George and the revolution principles. We recommend effeem and reverence for the person of the prince, who has probably been misled into the late and prefent measures by those about him; neither have we any doubt, that they themselves have been in a great degree deceived by false information from interested persons residing in America.—2dly. Be careful to maintain the union which at prefent fubfilts in all the colonies," on which the fuccess of every measure depends .-adly. We earneftly befeech all focieties to watch over their members, and difcourage luxury of living, public diversions, and gaming of all kinds .- 4thly. We recommend a regard to public order and peace; that all perfons confcientiously pay their debts, and to the utmost of their power ferve one another, so that the evils inseparable from a civil war may not be augmented by wantonness and irregularity.-5thly. We recommend to all ranks, but particularly to those who may be called to action, a spirit of humanity and mercy. We recommend that meekness and gentheness of spirit which is the noblest attendant on true valor. That man will fight most bravely, who never fights but when it is necessary, and who ceases to fight as soon as the necessity is over.—Lastly, We would recommend to all societies, not to content themselves with attending devoutly on fasts, but to continue habitually in prayer, and to have frequent voluntary meetings for solenn intercession with God on the important trial."

The accession of Georgia, was owing much to the exertions of the reverend Dr. Zubly; who roused the attention of many in the province to the alarming fituation of American affairs; fo that at length a general election was held for delegates to fit in provincial congress. They met on the fourth of July in Savannah; and requested the governor to appoint a day of fasting and prayer throughout the province, that a happy reconciliation might foon take place between America and the parent state, and that, under the auspicious reign of his majesty and his descendants, both countries might remain united, virtuous, free and happy, till time should be no more. His excellency James Wright consented, as the request was expressed in such loyal and dutiful terms, and the ends proposed such as every good man most ardently wished. They chose the reverend Dr. Zubly, and four others, delegates to represent the province in the continental congress; and at once entered into all the spirit of the resolutions formed by the other colonies, and adopted fimilar. They declared, that, though their province was not included in the late reftraining bill, they confidered that circumstance rather as an infult than a favor, as being meant to break the union of the provinces, as being grounded on the supposition, that the inhabitants of the excepted province could be base enough to turn the oppression of America into a mean advantage. They also agreed upon an humble address and representation to his majesty, which, as it was not deficient in a certain freshness of colouring, had the appearance of novelty.

[July 25.] The congress agreed in an address to the affembly of Jamaica; and in it said, "We receive uncommon pleafure from observing the principles of our righteous opposition distinguished by your approbation. We feel the warmest gratitude for your pathetic mediation in our behalf with the crown. The peculiar situation of your island forbids your affistance. But we having your good wishes to the friends of liberty and mankind,

They also resolved, That a body of forces, not exceeding five thousand, be kept up in the New-York department;—and that a further sum of one milion Spanish milled dollars, be struck in bills of thirty dollars each.

Vol. I. 3 C

[July 26.] They established a post-office, to reach from Falmouth, in New-England, to Savannah, in Georgia; and then un mimously elected Benjamin Franklin, esq; post-master general.

[July 27.] They proceeded to the establishment of an hospital for an army of 20,000 men; and elected Benjamin Church,

[July 28.] They agreed to an address to the people of Ireland, and in it furnished them with a true state of the colonial motives and objects, the better to enable them to judge of the conduct of the colonists with accuracy, and to determine the merits of the controverfy with impartiality and precision. They then anticipated the golden period, when liberty, with all the gentle arts of peace and humanity, should establish her mild dominion in the western world, and erect eternal monuments to the memory of those virtuous patriots and martyrs, who shall have fought and bled, and fuffered in her cause. Toward the close. the language is, "Accept our most grateful acknowledgments for the friendly disposition you have alway shown toward us .- We know that you are not without your grievances.-We fympathize with you in your diffrefs, and are pleafed to find that the defign of fubjugating us, has perfuaded administration to dispense to Ireland fome vagrant rays of ministerial funshine. - Even the tender mercies of government have long been cruel toward you. -In the rich passures of Ireland, many hungy parricides have fed, and grown strong to labour in its destruction." In the body of it, a shaft is elegantly pointed at one of the British generals.—
"America is amazed to find the name of Howe in the catalogue of her enemies :- she loved his brother." The former lord Howe fell by a shot from a French Indian, after landing on the left toward the bottom of Lake George, and while heading his corps and marching under the command of general Abercrombie, to attack Tyconderoga. The Maffachufetts affembly, to express their affection and strong sense of his worthy character, had a monument erected to his memory in Westminster-abbey.

[July 29.] The quotas of the several colonies toward the common expence was settled, for the present, subject to a future re-

[July 31.] The affemblies of New-Jersey, Pennsylvania and Virginia, having referred to the congress the resolution of the house of commons, comprehending lord North's conciliatory plan, they expressed their opinion upon it, to the following purpose, viz. "The colonies are entitled to the sole and exclusive privilege of giving and granting their own money. As they possess a right of appropriating their gifts, so are they entitled at all times

"The proposition contained in the resolution is unreasonable and infidious: unreasonable, because, if we declare we accede to it, we declare without refervation, we will purchase the favor of parliament, not knowing at the fame time at what price they will please to estimate their favor; it is insidious, because, individual colonies, having bid and bidden again, till they find the avidity of the feller too great for all their powers to fatisfy, are then to return into opposition, divided from their fifter colonies, whom the minister will have previously detached by a grant of easier terms, or by an artful procrastination of a definitive answer. The fuspension of the exercise of their pretended power of taxation being expressly made commensurate with the continuance of our gifts, these must be perpetual to make that so. The proposition is altogether unfatisfactory, because it imports only a suspension of the mode, not a renunciation of the pretended right to tax, us; because too, it does not propose to repeal the several acts of parliament complained of as grievances.

"Upon the whole, this proposition seems to have been held up to the world, to deceive it into a belief that there was nothing in dispute between us, but the mode of levying taxes; and that the parliament having now been so good as to give up this, the colonies are unreasonable if not perfectly satisfied: whereas, in truth, our adversaries still claim a right of demanding ad libitum, and of taxing us themselves to the full amount of their demand, if we do not comply with it. This leaves us without any thing

Congress had reprobated the conciliatory plan in their address to the British inhabitants; but now they discussed it fully, and exposed its futility. The next day, August the first, they adjourned to Tuesday the fifth of September.

The declaration of congress, their petition to the king, their address to the inhabitants of Great-Britain, the other to the pecple of Ireland, and their opinion upon the resolution of the house of commons, must evidence to the world, that they have men of the first abilities among them, whose writings will vie with the public declarations and acts of any powers, on the greatest occasions, in respect to art, address, and execution.

When you consider the variety of climates, soils, religions, civil governments, commercial interests, &c. which were represented in the former congress, and the late session of the present; and the various occupations, educations and characters of the gentlemen who composed them; you will judge, that the general harmony and unanimity which prevailed in them, is fearcely to be paralleled. At the revolution, such mighty questions as, "Whether is the throne vacant or not? Whether shall the prince of Orange be king or not?" were determined in the convention parliament, by imall majorities-the last question by two only. The great majorities, the almost unanimity, with which most capi al questions have been decided in the continental congress, will be confidered by numbers in no other light than as the happiest omens; or rather as providential dispensations in favor of the colonies; as well as the cleared demonstrations of their cordia!, figre, radical, and indifoluble union.

The adjournment of congress affords the delegates, the best means of confuling with their conflituents, as to what further measures it may be necessary to adopt: as also certain individuals, who may look forward to independency, a much more favorable opportunity of ripening their defigus by private, personal, intercourse with special confidents, than can be enjoyed by an epistolary correspondence. By well-timed hints, they may scatter those fentimental feeds, which shall at length produce events, not at prefent suspected even by the persons attending to such

before the fession was closed.

The inhabitants of South-Carolina were fo zealous, and the alarm spread by the Lexington engagement so extensive through the colony, that 172 members met in provincial congress, [June 1. agreeable to the summons issued three and twenty days before by the general committee.

[June 2.] They unanimously resolved, that an association was necessary, which was drawn up and figned by their president Henry Laurens, efg; and all the members prefent. In it they declared-" Thoroughly convinced that, under our present distresfed circumstances, we shall be justified before God and man, in relifting force by force, we do unite ourselves under every tie of religion and honor, and affociate as a band in the defence of an injured country against every foe-hereby solemnly engaging that, whenever our continental or provincial councils shall decree it necessary, we will go forth, and be ready to sacrifice our lives and fortunes to fecure her freedom and fafety. This obligation to continue in full force until a reconciliation shall take place between Great-Britain and America, upon constitutional principles-an event which we most heartily defire. will hold all those persons inimical to the liberty of the colonies who shall refuse to subscribe this association." This was afterward pretty generally subscribed by the inhabitants. [June

June 5.] It was refolved to raise two regiments of foot, and a regiment of rangers; and to put the town and province in a respectable posture of desence. The provincial congress were fensible, that the expences would be great. But it was the language there, as well as in the other colonies, among the friends to freedom, "We will freely give up half, or even the whole of our fortunes to secure our liberties." Bills of credit were struck, which, through the consent and enthusiasin of the people, supplied the present emergency.

So great was the military ardor among the gentlemen, that candidates for commissions were four times more than could be employed; and in the number were many of the first families and fortunes. The militia officers resigned their commissions under the governor, and by their own consent were subjected to the orders of the provincial congress.

Thus the popular leaders, in a few weeks, had an army and treafury at their command. Thirteen gentlemen were chosen a council of fafety.

While this congrefs was fitting, lord William Campbell, governor of the province, arrived, and was received with all the

[June 21.] The congress waited on him with an address, in which they disclosed to him the true causes of their present proceedings; and declared, that no love of innovation, no desire of altering the constitution of government, no lust of independence, had the least influence upon their counsels; but that they had been impelled to affociate and take up arms, folely for the preservation and in desence of their lives, liberties and properties.—
They entreated his excellency to make such a representation of the state of the colony, and of their true motives, as to affure his majesty, that he had no subjects, who more sincerely desired to testify their loyalty and affection, or would be more willing to devote their lives and fortunes in his real service. His lordship returned a very mild and prudent answer.

[June 22.] They adjourned, having first delegated a great part of their authority to the council of safety and the general committee; the former of which is in the nature of an executive, and the latter of a legislative authority. It was particularly recommended to the general committee, to take effectual methods to have the affociation signed through the province, and to demand from the non-subscribers the reasons of their refusal.

The non-subscribers have been advertised as inimical to the liberties of America, and all intercourse between them and the associators interdicted. An oath of neutrality has been required of all, to which some have agreed; others refusing have been disarmed:

difarmed; and a few, who would not enter into any engagements for the public fecurity, have been confined to their houses and plantations.

In these kinds of interesting civil broils, matters are generally carried to an excess, and policy often tramples upon truth and justice. Among the non-subscribers, there may have been several real friends to the liberties of America, who could not in conficience subscribe the association.

The South-Carolinians, have agreed upon a military opposition, were resolved to defend Charlestown to the last extremity; and yet the whole quantity of powder in the colony did not exceed three thousand pounds. A military opposition, not being originally designed or expected by them any more than by the people of the other colonies, there was the like inattention as elsewhere, in regard to the providing of stores. Reduced now to the alternative of sighting or submitting, they took extraordinary methods to obtain a supply. The inhabitants of East-Florida, having never joined in measures of opposition to Britain, the ports of that province were open for the purposes of trade.

Twelve persons, therefore, authorized by the council of safety, sailed from Charlestown for that coast; and by surprise, boarded a vessel near the bar of St. Augustine, though twelve British grenadiers, of the 14th regiment, were on board. They took out fifteen thousand pounds of powder, for which they gave a bill of exchange to the captain; and having secured a safe retreat to themselves, steered for Beaufort, and from thence by an inland navigation escaped their pursuers, and got safe to

North-Carolina was no less spirited than South. The militia were arrayed and exercised, and other measures taken to support whatever opposition they might be called to make against the British adherents. Governor Martin was equally vigorous, though not equally fuccessful. He expected, by means of the back fettlers, Scotch inhabitants, and Highland emigrants, to have made a stand against the patriotic party, and therefore took pains to fortify his palace at Newbern; but before it could be effected, his attempting to move the palace guns, alarmed the committee of the place; who, at the head of a body of armed men, interposed, seized and carried off six pieces of artillery, which lay behind the palace. This occasioned the governor's making a precipitate flight to Fort Johnson on Cape-Fear river. people, apprehensive that he would strengthen, and prepare it for the reception of a force to be employed in reducing the colony; and concluding, that he would encourage the flaves to revolt, in case of the failure of all other means to maintain the king's government; collected at Wilmington under colonel Ashe, who had refigned his governmental commission, [July 17.] and accepted one from popular authority. The colonel designed removing the king's artillery from the fort; but the cannon and stores were secured in time, by order of the governor, who retired on board the king's sloop the Cruiser.

[July 18.] Colonel Ashe, in the dead of the night, entered the fort, fired it, and reduced the houses and buildings to ashes. The next day he compleated the destruction of its wooden defences, to which the fire had not extended; and burnt the houses, and desolated every thing in the neighbourhood of the place, that

The Newbern committee apprehending he means to erect the king's flandard, and to commence holtilities, have refolved, "That no perfon or perfons whatfoever, have any correspondence with him, on pain of being deemed enemies to the liberties of America, and dealt with accordingly." Perfons, throughout the united colonies, dread being advertised for enemies to the liberties of America.

In treating of Virginia, we must go back to captain Henry's advancing with his volunteers toward Williamsburgh. The alarm it occasioned, put lord Dunmore upon converting his palace into a garrison, fortifying it in the best manner he could. and furrounding it with artillery. From thence he iffued a proclamation, charging Mr. Henry and his followers with rebellious practices, and attributing the present commotions to disaffection in the people, and a defire of changing the established form of government; which ferved only to increase the discontent. On the other hand, the Virginians, in their county meetings, applauded Mr. Henry's conduct; and infifted, that they wanted nothing but to preserve their ancient constitution, and only opposed innovations. The disturbances they charged to the governor's late conduct. The discontents of the people were increased by some procured copies of letters from his lordship to the minister of the American department, and which were feverely centured as containing not only unfavourable, but unfair and unjust representations, as well of facts, as of the temper and disposition of the colony.

In this state of disorder, on the arrival of dispatches from Great-Britain, the house of burgesses was suddenly and unexpectedly convened by the governor, [June 1.] The grand motive for it was to procure their approbation of lord North's conciliatory plan, accordingly in his speech he used the utmost ad-

The first act however of the house, was the appointment of a committee to inquire into the causes of the late disturbances, and particularly to examine the flate of the magazine, that measures might be taken for its replenishment. Means having been contrived by his lordship's order for fecuring the magazine, and notice having been given of fpring guns being prepared, some inconsiderate young men attempted to furnish themselves with arms out of it, and one of them was wounded. The mode of defending the magazine by fpring guns, and the unfortunate accident, irritated the minds of many, who were joined by others. A great concourse of people, from different parts, affembled, and though the house was sitting, broke open the magazine, and took away many of the arms. Some of the members, hearing what was going forward, repaired to the magazine, and though not in time to prevent its being forced open, by remonstrating with all the people they met against such proceedings, prevailed with them to return the arms. The keys of the magazine were afterward delivered to the committee of the house, by his lordship's order; who, upon examination, found most of the remaining powder buried in the magazine yard, where it fuffered confiderable damage by the rain: the muskets were deprived of their locks; and the magazine was naked and infufficient in all refpects.

June 7.] An account was brought into Williamsburgh, that captain Collins of the Magdalen, had flipped his cables, and was come up the river with a number of boats, containing a hundred men at least, intended to be marched into the city. Upon this report a number of people affembled under arms, that they might defend the city and its inhabitants, in case any thing hostile should be attempted. Upon hearing what his lordship had faid to the council, they retired peaceably and quietly, without any disturbance. However, their readiness to affemble under arms upon reports, without waiting to know whether they were true or falfe, made fuch an impression upon the governor's mind, that he with his lady and family quitted the place, early in the morning of July 8, proceeded to York-town, and went on board the Fowey man of war. He has the honor of being the first governor *, who thinks it necessary to quit his government, and take refuge on board his majesty's fleet: though in his letter of May the first, he held out to ministry his hope, that with a supply of arms and ammunition, he should be able to collect from among Indians, negroes, and other persons, a sufficient force to defend government. He left a message for the house of burgesses, acquainting them, that both himself and family were in constant danger through the fury of the people; that he hoped they would proceed in the business before them; and that he should attend as usual to the duties of his office, and was disposed to restore the harmony, which had been so unhappily interrupted!

[June 9.] The meffage produced a joint address from the council and house, declaring that they would cheerfully concur in any measure he should propose for the security of himself and family; observing how impracticable it would be to carry on business at such a distance, and entreating his return with his lady and family to the palace, as what would also afford great public satisfaction, and be the likeliess mean of quieting the minds of

[June 10.] His lordship returned a written answer, in which he justified his apprehensions of danger, and specified several charges against the house of burgesses. It contained many other matters tending to irritate: but concluded with mollifying terms, by no means equal however, to the removal of the acrimony excited by the preceding fevere charges and implications. It foon produced a reply, of an uncommon length, under the form of an address. The address comprehended the substance of the report of the committee, appointed by the house of burgesses when they first met; and was fraught with all the bitterness of recrimination, as well as with detenfive arguments, and an examination of facts. And yet the terms in which it was expressed, were as respectful as possible, and of a nature suited to the representative of their fovereign, and to their own dignity. When upon his lordship's letter to the earl of Dartmouth, they replied to his affertion, " not a few did join (in what he was pleased to call an opprobrious measure) to avoid paying their debts, in which many of the principal people here are much involved." "We can only answer for ourselves in the nagative; and must consider so indiscriminate a charge as extremely injurious." It is well known, that many not only in Virginia, but in every other colony, were deeply indebted to British creditors; and it may be admitted, that several of that number became professedly zealous patriots for American liberty, with a view either of escaping or of delaying the payment of their just debts. However to infer from thence, that the great body of popular leaders in the prefent difpute, were or are actuated by fuch a motive would be highly culpable. All the supporters of a good cause should be influenced by principles that are unexceptionable; but the state of mankind forbids the expectation of fo defirable an event. Vol. I. The .3 D

The report of the committee afferted, that a general tranquillity prevailed previous to the affair of the powder, and the governor's declaration about freeing the flaves; that the people had no defign or wifh after an independency of Great-Britain; that they had a most eager defire for such a connection as existed before the late acts of parliament; and that a redress of grievances would immediately establish tranquillity, and be productive of a reconciliation with the parent state.

[July 14.] The house of burgesles presented their address in answer to the governor's speech; in which they said of lord North's conciliatory motion, "We examined it minutely; we viewed it in every point of light in which we were able to place it, and, with pain and disappointment, we must ultimately declare, it only changes the form of oppression, without lightening its burden." They close with these expressive words—"We have decently remonstrated with parliament: they have added new injuries to the old. We have wearied our king with fupplications: he has not deigned to answer us. We have appealed to the native honor and justice of the British nation: their efforts in our favor have been hitherto ineffectual. What then remains to be done? That we commit our injuries to the evenhanded juffice of that Being who doth no wrong; earnestly befeeching him to illuminate the councils, and prosper the endeayours of those to whom America hath confided her hopes, that, through their wife direction, we may again fee, re-united, the bleslings of liberty and property, and the most permanent harmony with Great-Britain." The body of the address contains this remark, "Lord Chatham's bill on the one hand, and the terms of the congress on the other, would have formed a basis for negociation; which a spirit of accommodation, on both sides, might perhaps have reconciled."

Every day afforded new ground for bickering, and every incident fresh room for altercation between the governor and the house of burgesses. At length the necessary bills having passed the house, and the advanced season requiring the attendance of the members in their several counties, the council and burgesses jointly entreated the governor's presence to give his assent to them and finish the session. After messages to and fro, his lord-ship declined meeting them at the capitol, though they pledged their honor and every thing sacred, for his security; but he informed them, that he would be ready to receive them at his present residence. This answer put an end to all public correspondence between the governor and the colony. The burgesses passed resolutions declaring, that the message requiring them to attend him on board a ship of war, was a high breach of their rights and privileges; that they had reason to sear a dangerous attack might be meditated against the unhappy people of the colony; and that it was therefore their opinion, that they should prepare for the preservation of their property, and their inestimable rights and privileges. They then made strong professions of loyalty to the king, and amity to the mother country, and

[July 18.] A convention of delegates was appointed to supply the place of the house of burgesses, who, having an unlimited confidence reposed in them by the people, became accordingly possesses of an unlimited power in all public affairs. They also formed themselves into a committee to take into consideration the state of the colony; and the next day resolved, [July 19.] that a sufficient armed force be immediately raised and em-

that they remain firm to the cause they have espoused.

[July 26.] The Maryland convention met at Annapolis, and unanimously resolved upon an affociation to be signed by the members, and by all other the freemen of the province. faid, "We do unite as one band, and folemnly pledge ourselves to each other, and to America, that we will, to the utmost of our power, support the present opposition, carrying on, as well by arms as by the continental affociation, restraining our commerce." They also resolved, "That there be forty companies of minute men enrolled as foon as may be; and that every ablehodied effective freeman within the province, between fixteen and fifty (clergymen of all denominations, practifing phyficians, the houshold of the governor, minute and artillery men, and persons who from their religious principles cannot bear arms in any cafe, excepted) as foon as may be, and at furthest before the fiftcenth of September, shall enrol himself in some company of militia." They established a council of safety, consisting of fixteen persons, who are to regulate the operations of the minute men and militia, and are also, during the recess, to do all other matters for fecuring the province, and for providing for its defence.

They ordered committees of observation and of correspondence to be chosen; and bills of credit to the amount of 266,666 dollars to be struck with all convenient speed for the

The Pennfylvania affembly have established a military affociation through the colony, and ordered several battalions to be raised, clothed and armed. The whole colony is preparing for a vigorous defence. The change in the assembly from a most pacific to a martial complexion, is owing to the times. The number of Quakers returned to serve in it, was not so large as formerly; and some of them, being upon principle opposed to present measures, have resigned their seats, (which they have the privilege of doing) and left them to be filled by persons of a different judgment.

moft

The Philadelphians, with a view to the fafety of the city, are also engaged in making huge machines to sink in the narrow part of the Delaware, and in completing a number of large galliots, carrying at their bows guns from 32 to 48 pounders, swivels, &c. The machines are formed of large heavy square pieces of timber. Two long ones, at a proper parallel distance from each other, form the horizontal base that is to rest on the bed of the river. Right over these are placed two others of similar fize, rifing from toward the ends of the horizontal base, in such an angular direction, as with their elevated ends, fortified with ffrong iron points, to pierce any veffel which may fail against them. The degree of elevation is fuch as to give the greatest refiltance with the least danger to the timbers. The four main pieces are joined to each other by many shorter ones. The whole machine is fo contrived that, with its own weight, and what may be added to it when funk, it can neither be broken, nor forced backward, nor turned over. They have given the name of chevaux de frise to these machines.

The New-Yorkers were freed from the apprehensions they were under, through the expectation of troops from Europe, foon after their arrival. The fecond embarkation from Corke, consisting of four regiments, got safe to Sandy-Hook, where they received orders from general Gage to sail for Boston.—They were wanted to strengthen the army, after the loss it had suffained, by Breed's-hill battle. The few troops that were stationed at the barracks, about sifty, went on board the Asia man of war, some time before, on the sixth of June; so that the city of New-York was wholly without regulars.

[June 24.] Governor Tryon arrived at New-York from London. He is in much effect with a large number of the citizens and others; and if any one can fucceed in drawing off that colony from the union, he will probably be the person. It is not to be thought, that he is limited by ministry either as to expences or promises; but may suit himself to persons and emergencies. There is apparently good policy in employing him to effect the recovery of New-York to the side of administration. He was in hope of finding the province distinited from the others.

[July

[July 3.] The mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city, prefented him with a congratulatory address; complimented him upon the rectitude of his former administration, and expressed their trust, in the aid of his intercession with his majesty, for a speedy termination of the hostile animosities of his contending

fubjects.

The governor in his answer confessed his disappointment at the change of circumstances in the province. To palliate the treatment, which the memorial and reprefentation of the New-York general affembly met with, and to conciliate the minds of as many as could confide in his expressions, he closed with faying, "I am acquainted with a dispatch from the earl of Dartmouth, that the memorial and reprefentation of the general affembly of this province, were unfortunately blended with expreflions containing claims, which made it impossible for parliament, confistent with its justice and dignity to receive them; yet the petition to the king has been prefented to his majesty, who was pleafed to receive it with the most gracious expressions of regard and attention to the humble requests of his faithful subjects in New-York; and I am authorized to fay, that nothing can give greater satisfaction to the royal breast, than to see us again a happy and united people."

The fame day the address was presented, all the king's stores of various kinds were taken from Turtle-Bay and carried clear off,

Connecticut and Rhode-Island having had no occasion to change their forms of government, proceed in their usual modes of business, to fulfil the engagements that they are under, to the united colonies in general, and the Massachusetts in particular, and slag not in their ardour to support the cause of America.

[June 28.] Let us return to the Maffachusetts. Political necessity obliged the provincial congress to resolve, "That the notes and bills of the colony of Rhode-Island, of this and all the other colonies (except Nova-Scotia and Canada) shall be taken and received, and accounted a good and sufficient tender for the payment of all debts and damages arising upon the non-performance of any promises; and the committees of correspondence, inspection and safety, in the respective towns, are to return the names of all persons who shall contravene this resolve."

[July 9.] To procure a supply of articles for the troops of the colony, a resolve passed for the inhabitants of the several towns to surnish shirts, breeches, stockings and shoes, for the soldiers.—In a few days after, a recommendation passed,

necessity.

In confequence of the letters fent to the feveral towns and districts within the colony, for the choice of representatives, in order to take up a form of government, more than two hundred members met at Watertown, [July 19.] and constituted the house of affembly. The general fast interposing, the counsellors were not chosen till Friday morning the twenty-first.

[Aug. 8.] The house agreed to raise 30,000l. sterling. The raising of money will probably produce much distallistaction.—Great numbers, who are warm for the liberties of America, and violently opposed to being taxed by Great-Britain, are so inconsiderate as to imagine, they are to be exempted from almost every tax upon their succeeding in the present contest. They are for enjoying all the advantage of civilized society, without paying their proportion toward the expence of supporting it.

Aug. 9.] Captain Linzee, of the Falcon floop of war, chaced two schooners from the West Indies, one of which he soon brought to; the other, having the advantage of a fair wind, put into Gloucester harbour, at Cape-Anne; and the captain purfued into the harbour, bringing the one with him. He anchored and fent two barges with fifteen men each, armed with fwivels and muskets, attended with a whale boat, in which was the lieutenant and fix privates, meaning to feize the loaded fchooner. The militia and inhabitants took the alarm, collected, fired from the shore, and killed three men, beside wounding the lieutenant. On this the captain fent the other schooner and a small cutter well armed, with orders to fire on the damn'd rebels wherever they could fee them, while he engaged in cannonading the town. Not a ball struck or wounded a single person, though they passed through the houses filled with women and children, in almost every direction. The party at the water-fide foon made themfelves mafters of both the schooners, the cutter, the two barges, the boat, and every man in them. The action lasted several hours. The provincials lost but one man, and had two others wounded; one of whom is fince dead. They captured thirty-five men belonging to the Falcon, feveral of whom are wounded, and one of them fince dead. Captain Linzee after this warped off, having loft half his men.

[Aug. 12.] The fearcity of ammunition is fo alarming, that the house agreed upon recommending it to the inhabitants, not to fire a gun at beast, bird, or mark, without real necessity, to prevent a walle of powder.

About five weeks fince, general Gage fent two officers to New-York, to procure all the men they could, out of ships expected from Scotland or elsewhere, to join him as volunteers; and with orders to return to Boston with all expedition. This bespeaks a want of men. The want of fresh provision will be supplied for a short space, by the return of a sleet of transports, this day, [Aug. 15.] from the Sound, bringing with them about 2000 sheep, and 110 oxen, beside eggs, butter, &c. which they have taken off from Gardner's and other islands.

Governor Wentworth still continues in New-Hampshire; but the influence of the popular leaders is increasing, while his diminishes daily. He can no longer conside, as formerly, in the attachment of the people for safety; and has for these two months taken up his refidence at Fort William and Mary.

The bulk of the colonists have certainly been much encouraged in their struggles against the claims of parliament and administration, from the multiplied affurances they have received that the body of the people in England wish them success; and from their knowing that many of the most virtuous and independent of the nobility and gentry are for them; and among this order, in their estimation, the best bishop that adorns the bench*, as great a judge as the nation can boast +, and the greatest statesman it ever saw ‡.

LETTER XV.

Roxbury, December 30, 1775.

THE accession of Georgia to the colonies will occasion their being called henceforward THE THIRTEEN UNITED COLONIES. To aid in the defence of that colony, congress resolved early in November, to keep up a battalion there at the continental expence. Toward the close of the year, Dr. Zubly, perceiving that there was an apparent propensity to independency in several of the delegates, withdrew and returned to Georgia. His opposition to it being well known, and his influence upon the Georgia inhabitants being feared, it was contrived, that one of his brother delegates, Mr. John Houston, should likewise return, with a design of counteracting him, in case he should set himself to oppose independency.

^{*} The Bishop of St, Asaph, + Lord Camden, 1 Lord Chatham.

The first hostilities which happened in this colony between the opposite parties, commenced about the middle of November. when a number of royalists attacked the American whigs, and by their fuperiority obliged the latter, after three days, to furrender the fort in which they expected to make an effectual refiftance.

The governor of South-Carolina, lord William Campbell, after the provincial congress had raised troops, gave commissions to the officers of the volunteer companies of militia, that were formed and trained on the recommendation of the popular leaders. His lordship also convened an affembly, of which several officers in the provincial regiments were members; but finding them and their colleagues inflexibly fet against his schemes, he diffolved them, [Sept. 15.] and never afterward issued writs for a new election. He was indefatigable in secretly promoting opposition to the popular measures, and kept up a constant correspondence with the back country royalists. These people-were told, that it would be impossible to resist the power of Britain; that the whole dispute was about a trifling tax on tea, and that the expences of the new raifed provincial regiments would be infinitely more than the infignificant taxes imposed by the British parliament. They were therefore much difaffected with the proceedings of the provincial congress. It being suspected in Charlestown, that their difaffection was greatly owing to the governor; in order to ascertain, if possible, the connection between them, captain Adam M'Donald, of a new raised provincial regiment, introduced himself to his lordship, about the middle of September, under the feigned name of Dick Williams, a supposed confidential messenger from these royalists. In this assumed character he had a long conversation with his lordship, and was informed, that a letter received the day before fet forth, "That his majesty was determined speedily to send out troops to execute his schemes from one end of the continent to the other." The conversation being reported to the general committee, they sent a deputation, of which captain M'Donald was one, to demand a com? munication of his lordship's late dispatches from England, and a perufal of his correspondence with the back country. These requisitions being refused, it was moved to take the governor into custody, but the motion was rejected by a great majority. His lordship, mortified at the deception which had been passed upon him, and distrustful of his personal safety in Charlestown, took the provincial seal with him, and retired on board the Tamar floop of war.

[Nov. 1.] When the new provincial congress met, it was thought by the royalists, that the determinations of the former would have been reverfed; but they were disappointed.

In order to obstruct the passage of the king's ships to Charlestown, through Hog-Island channel, a number of hulks were ordered to be sunk, and captain Tusts had the charge of covering the workmen, on board a schooner, armed for the security of the town, and called the Desence. [Nov. 12.] The Tamar and Cherokee warped in the night, within gun shot of him, and began a heavy cannonade; but at sun-rise dropped down to their moorings, without having done any material injury. This was the commencement of open hostilities in South-Carolina.

[Nov. 13.] The provincial congress impressed the ship Prosper, and ordered her to be fitted as a frigate of war. They voted to raise a regiment of artillery, [Nov. 14.] to consist of three companies of a hundred men each; and that bills of credit amounting to 17,000l. Sterling should be struck for their support. About the same time a new council of safety was appointed, and authorised "to do all such matters and things relative to the strengthening and defending the colony, as should by them be judged ex-

That you may comprehend the nature of the opposition to popular measures in this colony, you must be informed of various events relating to the back country. About 1770, the extreme difficulty of bringing criminals from remote settlements to a legal condemnation, induced numbers, stilled regulators, to take the law into their own hands. They inflicted corporal punishment on persons without a regular condemnation. Lord Charles Greville Montague, the governor to correct these abuses, advanced one Scovil, a man of low character, to the rank of colonel, and employed him to enforce settled law among these regulators. He adopted severe measures, which involved multitudes in great distress, who having suffered so for opposing regular government, could not be persuaded to co-operate with their countrymen in the support of congresses and committees, whom they conceived to be similar to their own regulating assemblies.

A number of Dutch inhabitants had fettled in the fame part of the country, on lands granted by the government. They brought from Europe the monarchical ideas of their holding their possessions at the king's pleasure. They were therefore easily made to believe, that the loss of their freeholds would be the consequence of their acceding to American measures. After the peace of Paris, lands were offered upon easy terms, to induce foreign Protestants to exchage their native country for a fettlement in South-Carolina. The Irish, who accepted these of-

The violence of some over-zealous friends, who infifted upon their neighbours signing the association, produced in several a determined spirit of opposition.

At an election for representatives in the first popular assemblies. Moses Kirkland was an insuccessful candidate. In wrath he exclaimed, "If this dispute becomes serious, the people of South-Carolina shall feel the weight of my influence." The provincial congress, to gain him, gave him the rank of captain in one of the provincial regiments; but he was disgusted, that his rival was promoted to the higher rank of major. He accepted his commission, and inlisted men; but soon resigned, and to the utmost encouraged opposition to the measures of congress.

The people in general felt themselves secure in their persons and property. It was therefore easy to offer arguments against renouncing present comforts, to ward off suture evils. It was infinuated to them, that the gentlemen on the sea coast, in order to obtain their tea free from tax, were adopting measures which would involve the back country in the want of salt, ofnaburgs, and imported necessaries. The popular leaders could not urge the inhabitants to the dangers and expences of war, otherwise than on speculation, to prevent the more alarming consequences which would probably take place in future, if the proceedings of the British parliament, against Boston and the Massachusetts,

Though there were many royalists in most parts of the colony, the principal fettlement, in which they out-numbered the friends of congress, was in the country between the Broad and Saluda rivers. When it was determined to raife troops, the inhabitants of that part could not be perfuaded, that the measure was neces-They were happy, and free from present oppression, and averse to believing that any defigns, inimical to American liberty, had been adopted by the British government. The council of fafety fent the honorable William Henry Drayton, and the reverend William Tennent, to explain to them the nature of the dif-They had feveral meetings, and much eloquence was exerted to induce them to fign the affociation. Some subscribed; but the greater part could not be persuaded, that there was any necessity for congresses, committees, or military establishments. Sufpicions prevailed. The friends of the royal government doubted the authenticity of all pamphlets and news-papers, which afcribed to the British troops in Boston, or to the British government, any defigns injurious to the rights of the colonists. They viewed the whole as an imposition by artful men. The friends of congress suspected the leading men of the royalists to be in the pay of lord William Campbell. Reports were circulated by one party, that a plan was laid to feize the commissioners sent by the council of fafety: by the other, that the third provincial regiment was brought up to compel the inhabitants to fign the affociation. Motives and defigns were reciprocally attributed to each other of the most mischievous tendency. The royalists imbodied for reasons similar to those which had induced the other inhabitants to arm themselves against Britain. They suspected their adversaries of an intention to dragoon them into a compliance with the measures of congress; and they, in their turn, were fuspected of a defign to commence hostilities against the affociators, for disturbing the established royal government. Camps were formed in opposition to each other, and great pains taken to increase their respective numbers. Moderate men employed their good offices; and after some days, the leaders on both sides met in conference. Several explications having taken place, a treaty was reciprocally agreed to, [Sept. 16.] by which it was stipulated, that the royalists should remain in a state of neutrality. Both parties retired to their homes, and a temporary calm fuecceded.

But Mr. Robert Cunningham, a principal leader among the royalists, continued to encourage opposition to popular measures, and declared that he did not confider himself as bound by the treaty. This declaration was construed as an evidence of a fixed intention again to disturb the peace. To prevent his attempting it, he was apprehended, brought to Charlestown, and committed to jail. His brother, Mr. Patrick Cunningham, instantly. armed a party of friends and purfued, in expectation of rescuing him. The party collected on this occasion seized a thousand pounds of powder, and a quantity of lead, which was passing through their fettlement, as a present to the Cherokee Indians: and was intended to confirm them in their pacific disposition. Some persons among the royalists propagated a report, that it was accompanied with instructions to them, to kill every man who should refuse to sign the association. This answered the purpose of inflaming the minds of several. It was also confidently afferted, that private marks had been agreed on by the popular leaders and Indian chiefs, to distinguish the affociators from the non-affociators; the former of whom were to be spared, and the latter facrificed. Great pains were moreover taken, to exafperate the inhabitants against the council of safety; for furnishing

Lord William Campbell had uniformly recommended to the rovalists to remain quiet till the arrival of a British force. This advice had been providentially fruffrated. Similar reasons of policy to those which induced the royal governor to recommend inaction to the royalists, operated with the council of fafety to crush their intestine foes before that force should arrive. The rifing occasioned by the seizing of Mr. Cunningham, was conflrued into a violation of the treaty, and gave ground to doubt the fincerity of their engagements to continue in a state of neutrality. It was feared, that as foon as a proper opportunity offered, they would throw their weight into the royal feale. It was therefore judged necessary, to march an army into their fetthements before that event should exist. But to remove prejudices, the provincial congress, first of all circulated through their fettlements, [Nov. 19.] a declaration affigning the reasons for the present to the Cherokees, and detecting the invidious mifrepresentations that had been put upon the measure. They folemnly declared before Almighty God, that they did not be-Heve any order was ever iffued, or any idea ever entertained by the late council of fafety, or any member of it, or by any perfon under authority of congress, to cause the Indians to commence hostilities upon the frontiers or any part thereof. then fent forward a large body of militia and new raifed regulars who were joined by feven hundred militia from North-Carolina. and two hundred and twenty regulars. They foon had an army of feveral thousand men under their direction, with instructions " to apprehend the leaders of the party which had feized the powder, and to do all other things necessary to suppress the present and prevent future infurrections." Affurances were publicly given, that no injury should be done to inoffensive persons, remaining quietly on their plantations. The leaders of the royalists found great difficulty in perfuading their followers to imbody; and they themselves were destitute of political knowledge and military experience. The unanimity of the whigs, and the numbers, which from all fides invaded the fettlements of the royalists, difficartened them from facing their adversaries in the field. The whigs acted by fystem, and in concert with their brethren of neighbouring colonies, and were directed by a council of fafety, composed of the greatest and wifest men in the province.-They eafily carried every point, feized the leaders of the royalists, and differsed their sollowers, without the loss of a single man: most of the royalists returned to their plantations, while feveral retired over the mountains. In

In North-Carolina, the committees of the diffrict of Wilmington alledged a number of charges against governor March, particularly those of fomenting a civil war and of exciting an infurrection among the negroes; upon which they declared him an enemy to America in general, and to that province in particular, and forbad all persons holding any communication with him.

[Aug. 8.] When their proceedings appeared in print, the governor published his remarks upon them, in a proclamation of uncommon length; which the provincial congress, in their fublequent meeting at Hillsborough, [Aug. 25.] resolved unanimoully to be a false, scandalous, scurrilous, málicious and se: ditious libel, and ordered it to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. Four days before, a plan of confederation was laid before them. Upon mature deliberation they refolved, that "They are of opinion, that the plan of general confederation between the united colonies is not at present eligible; and that the present association ought to be further relied on for bringing about a reconciliation with the parent state, and a further confederacy ought only to be adopted in case of the last extremity." Afterward Sept. 8.] Mr. Hooper submitted to them an address to the inhabitants of the British empire, which was unanimously received. In answer to the suggestion, that independence was their object, they fay, " We again declare, and we invoke that Almighty Being who fearches the recesses of the human heart, and knows our most secret intentions, that it is our most earnest wish and prayer to be restored, with the other united colonies, to the flate in which we and they were placed before the year 1763, disposed to glance over any regulations which Britain had made previous to this and which feem to be injurious and oppressive to these colonies, hoping that, at some future day, she will benignly interpofe, and remove from us every caufe of complaint.

They broke up two days after, having fat three weeks. During the fession, they agreed upon raising a 1000 men: upon striking a quantity of paper money, for the subsistence of the troops; upon inlisting a considerable body of minute men; in a word, upon putting the colony immediately into a state of

Within a fortnight after the session closed, the grand repository of the governor's magazine was discovered. In the palace garden, under a bed of cabbages, was found a barrel, containing about three bushels of gunpowder. In the palace cellar were dug up two quarter casks of the same commodity; and in the garden about 1000lb. of musket balls, about 500 weight of iron fwivel balls, a large quantity of small shot, lead, iron, worms for the cannon, and the whole apparatus for his park of artillery.

The Virginia convention continued to establish rules for the defence and regulation of the colony; and passed an ordinance for imbodying a sufficient force for its protection. It appearing to them, that only 15 half barrels of powder had been taken out of the magazine by lord Dunmore's order, they valued it fairly, and then directed the surplus money received by Patrick Henry,

efq. to be returned to the receiver general. [August 22.]

Upon a petition of fundry merchants and others, natives of Great-Britain, mostly from Scotland, praying to be exempted from bearing arms against the people among whom they were born, and promising to observe a strict neutrality in case the colony was attacked by the British troops, the convention unanimously recommended to the committees, [August 25.] and others the good people of the colony, to treat all such resident natives as did not show themselves enemies to the common cause of America, with lenity and friendship; to protect all persons whatsoever in the just enjoyment of their civil rights and liberty; to discountenance all national reslections; and to promote union, harmony, and mutual good will, among all ranks of people.

Before the fession ended, the delegates in a declaration set forth the cause of their meeting, and the necessity of immediately putting the country into a posture of defence, for the better protection of their lives, liberties, and properties. In it they folemnly declare, "before God and the world, we do bear faith and true allegiance to his majesty; and will, so long as it may be in our power, defend him and his government, as founded on the laws and well-known principles of the constitution: we will, to the utmost of our power, endeavour by every honorable mean, to promote a restoration of that friendship and amity, which fo long and happily fubfifted between our fellow fubjects in Great-Britain, and the inhabitants of America: and as, on the one hand, we are determined to defend our lives and properties, and maintain our just rights and privileges, at even the extremest hazard, so, on the other hand, it is our fixed and unalterable resolution to disband such forces as may be raised in this colony, whenever our dangers are removed, and America is restored to its former state of tranquillity and happiness."

Lord Dunmore however, being joined by a number, who had rendered themselves obnoxious to the country, as well as by a parcel of run-away negroes, and supported by the naval force upon the station, endeavoured to establish such a marine, as might enable him, by means of the noble rivers with which the colony abounds, to be always at hand, and ready to profit by every favourable occasion which should offer. He by degrees fitted and armed several vessels, in one of which he constantly resided, never setting his foot on shore, but in an hostile manner. The force was calculated only for depredations; and while these were confined to the procuring of provisions or other necessaries, respect was shown to the rank and office of the governor: but being at length changed into open and avowed hostility, his lordship met with resistance. The Virginians could not brook his seizing persons, and conveying them on board the ships; destroying plantations, and carrying off the negroes; and burning houses. They therefore sent detachments of the newraised forces to protect the coasts; and from thence ensued a small mischievous war, incapable of affording honor or benefit.

During this state of hostility, his lordship procured a few soldiers, with whose assistance an attempt was made to burn the port-town of Hampton. The inhabitants having a previous suspicion of the design, sunk a number of boats across the channel to prevent a landing. The ships, having surmounted all obstacles in the night, drew up close to the town, October 27. and began a furious cannonade in the morning. At this critical period, a detachment of rislemen from Williamsburgh, that had marched all night, arrived, and being joined by the minute men and others, who had assembled the day before, took such a position as enabled them, with their small arms, to compel the enemy precipitately to quit their station, with the loss of some men and of a tender.

[Nov. 7.] In consequence of this repulse, the governor issued a proclamation, declaring that martial law should take place, and be executed through the colony; requiring all persons capable of bearing arms to refort to his majesty's standard, or to be looked upon as traitors; and further declaring all indented servants, negroes or others (appertaining to rebels) free, who were able and willing to bear arms, upon joining his majesty's troops. The Virginians highly resented his lordship's declaring martial law; and by his single stat, attempting to strip them of their property, and to arm their negroes and servants against them to effect their destruction. This measure occasioned to government the loss of many friends.

The proclamation with his lordship's presence and his marine, produced some effect in the town of Norfolk and the adjoining country, where many were well affected to the old government. He was accordingly joined by some hundreds of blacks and whites: but the pleasure it afforded was soon interrupted by intelligence, that a party of Virginians were marching toward them with great expedition. To obstruct their designs, and protect the well affected, he took possession of the Great Bridge near Norfolk, a pass of much consequence, being the only way by which the town could be approached. He constructed a fort on the Norfolk side, and rendered it as desensible as time would admit. His force consisted of about 200 regulars, including the grenadiers of the 14th regiment, and a body of Norfolk volunteers: the rest was a mottey mixture of blacks and whites. The Virginiaus, under colonel Woodford, fortisted themselves within less than cannon shot of the royalists, having a narrow-causeway in front, which was to be passed to come at their works.

In this flate they continued quiet on both fides for some days. At length a fervant belonging to major Marshall, being properly tutored, deferted to the royalists, and told them, that colonel Woodford had not more than 300 shirtmen (as they called the rislemen, on account of their being dressed in their hunting shirts) badly provided with ammunition. The bait took, and a defign was formed for furprifing the Virginians in their intrenchments. Captain Leslie with the regulars, arrived at the bridge about three in the morning; and being joined by about 300 white and black flaves, laid planks upon the bridge, and croffed just after the Virginians had beaten the reveille, a lucky time for the last, as their men were of course all under arms. Captain Fordyce, at the head of his grenadiers, amounting to about fixty, led the van, while lieutenant Batut commanded the advanced party.-They passed the causeway, which admitted only of a few men's marching abreast, and approached the intrenchments with fixed bayonets, and a coolness and intrepidity which excited astonishment. They were not only exposed naked to the fire in front. but enfiladed by another part of the provincial lines. The captain fell with feveral of his men, within a few yards of the breaft work. The lieutenant with others were taken, and all the furvivors of the grenadier company, whether prisoners or not, were wounded. The royalists were soon obliged to sound a retreat, having fixty-two men killed and wounded. The provincials, during the whole action, did not lofe a fingle man, and had only one flightly wounded. The fire of the artillery from the fort covered the retreat of the royalists. None of the blacks, &c. in the rear, with captain Leslie, advanced further than the bridge. Captain Fordyce was buried with every military honor by the victors, who showed a due respect to his former merit, as well as to the gallantry which fignalized his last moments. tish prisoners were treated with great kindness: the American royalists, who joined the king's standard, with rigor. The king's forces retired the ensign night, without other loss than a few pieces of cannon. Captain Leslie, it is said, has absolutely refused to act any more on shore, till he can be better supported; on the other hand, the Norfolk volunteers, and the black battalions, have declined acting without the regulars; this has induced his lordship to abandon the intrenchments at Norfolk, and to go on board the ships. Most of the wretched negroes, who had joined him, were now lest to shift for themselves.

[Dec. 14.] Colonel Woodford with the provincials, entered Norfolk; but almost all the inhabitants had fled on board the ships. At night he refigned the command to colonel Howe, defigning to return to his family, and attend on his private

Many of the Scotch petitioners having, contrary to their faith, folemnly plighted, become first adherents to lord Dunmore, and active promoters of his measures; and having excited their flaves to act against the colony, the convention has totally rescinded the former recommendation in their favor. But perfons of ability, declining to act with the Virginians, and who have not taken up arms nor showed themselves against them, may be permitted to leave the country.

One John Connelly, a native of Pennsylvania, waited on his lordship with certain proposals, toward the latter end of July, which being approved of, he dispatched intelligence to the officers of the militia on the frontiers of Augusta county, with affurances from his lordship, that such of them as would hereafter evince their loyalty to his majesty, by putting themselves under his command, should be amply rewarded. He had before, by direction, prepared the Indians on the Ohio, to act in concert with him against his majesty's enemies in that quarter. His lordship sent him to general Gage at Boston, about the 15th of September; and about the middle of October he returned with instructions from the general to his lordship. A commission of lieutenant colonel commandant of a regiment to be raifed in the back parts and in Canada, was to be granted to this adventurer; who was to be affished by the garrisons at Detroit, and Fort Gage at the Illinois with artillery and ammunition. He was to use means to urge the Indian chiefs to act with vigor in the execution of his orders; and to have the supreme direction of the When they were in fufficient condition, he was to penetrate through Virginia, fo as to meet lord Dunmore at a fet time in next April at Alexandria on the Patomak; his lordthip was to bring such a naval strength and other assistance, as Vol. I. might might be deemed necessary for the purpose. He had so far succeeded, that he was on his way, with two affociates, to Detroit: where he was to meet his commission and infructions: but when they had reached about five miles beyond Hager's-town, they were taken into custody and brought before the county committee at Fredericktown in Maryland, [Nov. 23.] for examination, about ten days after parting with lord Dunmore.-Their papers have berrayed every thing. Among them were the general plan of the whole business, and a letter from lord Dunmore to one of the Indian chiefs, and other authentic vouchers. which leave nothing to be doubted. His lordship's letter was accommodated, as is usual in all such cases, to the Indian taste, and addressed to Brother Captain White Eyes, who was to acquaint the Corn-Stalk, as well as the chiefs of the Mingoes, and the other fix nations, with the fentiments contained in it.

The capture of Connelly and his affociates, is ascribed to the féizure of an express passing between an Indian commissary and the governor; from whose papers such intelligence was gained, as to put the provincial committee upon keeping a good look out for the parties. The Indian commissary was known to be disaffected to the American cause by a gentleman, whose suspi-

The Pennsylvania general affembly, in their November feffion, influcted their delegates to exert their endeavours at the continental congress, for the adoption of such measures as might afford the best prospect of obtaining a redress of American grievances, and of restoring the union and harmony between Great-Britain and the colonies. They faid, "Though the op-pressive measure of the British parliament and administration have compelled us to refift their violence by force of arms, yet we strictly enjoin you, that you, in behalf of this colony, diffent from, and utterly reject, any propositions, should such be made, that may cause or lead to a separation from the mother country, or a change in the form of this government." The reason for mentioning a change in the form of this government, was congress's recommendation of a measure of that kind to the provincial convention of New-Hampshire, which will be properly noticed in its place.

[Nov. 16.] Governor Franklin met the general affembly of New-Jerfey. In his speech he acquainted them, "That the commanders of his majesty's squadron's in America, have orders to proceed as in the case of a town in actual rebellion, against fuch of the sea-port towns and places, being accessible to the king's ships, as shall offer any violence to the king's officers, or in which any troops shall be raised, or military works erected, or other than by his majesty's authority, or any attempts made to seize or plunder any public magazine of arms or ammunition." He faid, "Sentiments of independency, are by fome men of prefent confequence, openly avowed, and elfays are already appearing in the public papers, to ridicule the people's fears of that horrid measure." The house of assembly, in their answer declared, [Nov 29.] "There is nothing we defire with greater anxiety than a reconciliation with our parent state, on constitutional principles. We know of no featiments of independency that are by men of any consequence openly avowed; nor do we approve of any effays tending to encourage fuch a measure. We have already expressed our detestation of such opinions, and we have so frequently and fully declared our fentiments on this fubject, that we should have thought ourselves, as at present we really deserve to be, exempt from all suspicion of this nature." The governor in his reply mentioned, that he had not the most distant thought, while speaking of the sentiments of independency openly avowed by fome, that they would confider the remark as at all meant for, or applicable to their house. He concluded with pointedly faying, "I fincerely wish that both you and I may ere long have the happiness to see those who either openly or privately avow fentiments of independency, men of no consequence."

The New-York convention having refolved upon the removal of the cannon from the battery in the city, captain Sears was appointed to the business. Captain Vandeput, of the Asia man of war, was privately informed of the design, and prepared to oppose its execution. Learning when it was to be attempted, he appointed a boat to watch the motions of the people affembled for that purpose about the dead of night. The failors in the boat giving the fignal, with a flash of powder, of what was going forward, the persons on shore mistook it for an attempt to fire a musket at them, and immediately aimed a volley of shot at the boat, by which a man was killed. Captain Vandeput soon after commenced a firing from the Asia with grape shot, fwivel shot, 18 and 24 pounders, without killing a single perfon, and wounded only three, two flightly, the other lost the calf of his leg. He then ceased for a considerable time, supposing that the people had defisted from their purpose; while they were only changing their mode of opperation. Captain Sears provided a deceiving party, intended to draw the Asia's fire from the line of the working party. He fent the former behind a breaft work, by which they were fecured on dodging down upon observing the flash of the Asia's guns. When all was in readinels, they huzzaed, and fang out their notes as though tugging in unifon, and fired from the walls; while the working party. filently got off twenty-one eighteen pounders, with carriages, empty cartridges, rammers, &c. Upon hearing the noise, and feeing the fire of the mulketry, the captain ordered the Alia to fire a whole broad-fide toward that part of the fort, where the deceiving party had fecured themselves, without intending a particular injury to the city; however, fome of the shot could not but fly into it and do damage. This affair happened at a very late hour, between twelve and two, [August 22.] and threw the citizens into the utmost consternation. Such was the stillness of the night, that the report of the cannon was heard at Philadelphia, ninety miles off. The distress of the Yorkers was much increased, by a painful apprehension, that captain Vandeput would renew his firing upon the city. A removal of men, wo-men, children and goods commenced, and continued till Saturday. Matters were afterward fo adjusted, as to quiet the appreheufions of the people, in reference to their fuffering further from the Asia. To prevent it, the convention permitted Abraham Lott, esq; to supply all his majesty's slips, stationed at New-York, with all necessaries, as well fresh as saked, for the fole use of faid ships.

The art and influence of governor Tryon alarmed the continental congress, some of the members especially, so that it was moved, that he should be seized. But Mr. Duane, one of the New-York delegates, speaking in behalf of, and answering for him, no resolution to that purpose was taken. Mr. Duane saying, in his eagerness to defend the governor, that he was as good a friend to the American cause as any one present, called up captain John Langdon from New-Hampshire, who refenting the affertion as an afperfion on the feveral members, answered with much acrimony, and was permitted to go on as long as he pleased, Mr. Duane's conduct not having answered, in several instances, the warm wishes of the zealous delegates. Though nothing was refolved upon against governor Tryon, the matter only fubfided for the prefent, under an apprehension that if the motion was made, it would not be carried, or when carried, would be conveyed to the governor time enough for him to fecure himself. The affair was brought on again after a while in another form; and congress resolved, [October 6.] "That it be recommended to the feveral provincial affemblies or conventions, and councils or committees of fafety, to arrest and fecure every person in their respective colonies, whose

colony, or the liberties of America."

An authentic copy of the refolve was to be transmitted by the delegates to proper persons in the different colonies.

—The fathers of it aimed at governor Tryon; they had little or no expectation that the New-York convention would fecure him; but they hoped that the fons of liberty at large would effect the business. It has been afferted, that Mr. Duane was uneasy at the refolution, and withdrew from congress for near an hour before he returned to his seat. Be that as it may, it is certain, that Mr. Duane's footman went off to governor Tryon in feafon to give him information of what was resolved; which occasioned his writing to the mayor of New-York, [Oct. 13.] acquainting him that he knew from undoubted authority, what was recommended to the provincial congress, and desiring to be informed whether he should be secure in the protection of the corporation and citizens. The provincial congress had not then received the recommendation. Several letters passed upon the occasion, but the governor not obtaining fatisfaction as to his being fecure, went on board the Halifax packet, [Oct. 19.] of which he informed the mayor by letter; and in that expressed his readiness to do fuch business of the country, as the situation of the times would permit.

A correspondent residing at New-York complains, that the leaders of the people in that colony are inconsistent and persidious, and that their councils are stampt with folly, timidity and treachery. Some days before the governor went on board, members of the provincial convention, declared even in the convention, that they would not receive the bills of credit to be emitted by themselves; that they would join the king's standard if troops came, in order to save their estates, &c. These speeches

The day the governor fent his letter from on board, Meffrs. Low, De Lancey, Walton, Kiffam, Verplank, &c. &c. labored hard in the provincial congress, to preclude the freemen of the city from voting for new members, and the mode of voting by ballot. They were for polling as formerly, and expected, that if the freemen were excluded, the freeholders would return none, but such as would be for preserving the city though at the expence of the liberties of America.

The New-York troops are not to be depended upon in general. Perfons who have been pretty hearty, are now afraid of falling a facrifice. The defection becomes greater every day in both city and country. This may be owing to the arts of governor Tryon, whose exertions may be as strenuous and successful in the ship as in the city. He is not at a loss how to intrigue with the people of his government.

Such

Such is the importance of fecuring the North-River, that the continental congress have given direction for rendering it defensible, by erecting fortifications in the High-lands, and garrifoning the fame, They have also directed Mr. Alexander, titular lord Stirling, to collect the troops in and for the defence of New-Jerfey, [Nov. 27.] (except fix companies ordered to the forts on the North-River) and to place them in barracks in the eastern division of the colony, as contiguous to New-York as can be, there to remain till further orders. The city abounds with persons opposed to congressional measures. This opposition was much strengthened by Mr. Rivington's press which was carried off four days before the above order. Captain Sears obferving the mischievous effects of this press, determined upon a violent and effectual mode of filencing it. He procured feventyfive Connecticut horsemen, well armed with muskets, &c. unexpectedly entered the city at the head of them; repaired immediately to Mr. Rivington's, and feized all his types and printing materials, many of which were destroyed. While he was thus employed, people collected, and the street was thronged. prevent interruption, he called out and told them, that if they attempted to oppose him, he would order his men to fire upon them; and preparation was made for doing it, in case it should be needful. This appearance instantly cleared the street, when captain Sears and his party rode off in triumph, with the booty they were pleafed to take away.

[Sept. 30.] Captain Wallace, in the Rose man of war, and two tenders, began in the morning to fire upon Stonington in Connecticut, close in with the Sound; and continued it the whole day, with very little intermission. They killed two men, much shattered the houses, stores, &c. and carried off a schooner loaded with molasses, and two small sloops. The firing was brought on by a vessel (which he was in chace of) escaping and fecuring itself in the harbour of the town. The men of war and transports at Newport, exciting a suspicion by their movements, that there was an intention of taking off live flock from the farms, in the fouth part of Rhode-Island, a number of perfons went down in the evening [Oct. 2.] and brought off about 1000 sheep and 50 head of cattle. The next day and the following one the ships took off a quantity from the two farms, where it was thought they were collected for the purpose of supplying the British troops at Boston. Soon after 300 minute men arrived who marched to the spot, [Oct. 5.] and brought off the remaining cattle, sheep, hogs and poultry, though fired upon by the ships which lay within gun shot. The interposition of the minute men subjected the town to threats of being cannonaded by the men of war; fo that many of the inhabitants moved their effects, while others left the place. On Saturday afternoon, [October 7.] the ships weighed anchor, went up the river to Bristol, and demanded 300 sheep, which not being complied with, between eight and nine o'clock, they began a heavy fire on the town, and continued it upward of an hour. The women and children, in great anxiety (dark and rainy as it was) were obliged to leave their habitations, and feek shelter in the adjacent country. Between nine and ten a committee went on board and purchased the peace and fafety of the town at the expence of forty sheep. The firing thus upon a defenceless town greatly irritated the minds of the Americans in distant colonies, and they have censured it in their public transactions.

[Nov. 11.] The general affembly of Rhode-Illand paffed an act for the capital punishment of persons who should be found guilty of holding a traiterous correspondence with the ministry of Great-Britain, or any of their officers or agents, or of supplying the ministerial army or navy employed against the united colonies, with provisions, arms, &c. or of acting as pilots on board any vessels. They however excepted, the negociation and treaty of the town council with captain Wallace, respecting the supplying the ships of war stationed in the harbour of Newport, and regulation thereof by the commanding officer, which they had before permitted. They also passed an act for sequestering the estates of several persons, whom they considered as avowed enemies to the liberties of America.

[Nov. 30.] Captain Wallace, about one in the morning, left the harbour of Newport, went to Conanicut with several vessels, and landed about 200 marines, failors, and negroes, who were employed in burning the houses and barns upon the island. The men, while upon the fervice, were ordered to fire on one Mr.

Martin, who gave no provocation, and was standing unarmed at his own door. He was shot in the belly and died. He was an inoffensive person, and had treated capt. Wallace with great civility

General Lee was at length detached with a small corps from the army in the Massachusetts, to the assistance of the Rhode-Iflanders; on whom, upon his arrival, he imposed a most tremendous oath. This act of the general's does not meet with the approbation of the congress.

The Massachusetts military and naval transactions will be related

The American prisoners taken on the 17th of June, were thrown indifcriminately into the jail at Boston, without any confideration being paid to those of rank, though languishing with wounds wounds and fickness. The fick and wounded were put under the hands of a man, who had never before been employed, but in the diseases of horses*. The inhabitants of the town, who befriended the American cause, were not allowed to afford the prifoners all that relief they were entitled to upon the principles of humanity. The fufferers had even some of their books of devotion taken from them, and were reproached for their much reading, as leading them into rebellion. Being accounted rebels, no cruelty was thought more than they deferved, while their existence was not terminated by a halter.

The education and reading of the colonists have undoubtedly contributed to encourage and support their opposition to measures. deemed destructive to the liberties of their country. Every town in the Massachusetts and Connecticut has a public English school for the education of youth, supported by an annual tax upon the inhabitants: to which any one may fend his children, while the expence of their education is nothing more than his proportion of the tax. The masters are often young men, who have finished their college education; and who fpend a year or more in this employ, till they take to a different one, which often leads to their becoming some of the first persons in the colony. The univerfal education promoted by these schools, spreads a general knowledge among the lowest orders of people; and gives them a taste for reading the interesting publications of the day; while able writers have been and are employing their pens, in nourishing the spirit of relistance, by arguments, historical narrations,

[Aug. 11.] General Washington wrote to general Gage upon the subject of the ill treatment of the prisoners, and apprized him, that he should regulate his conduct toward those gentlemen who are or may be in his poffession, exactly by the rule that the other should observe toward the Americans who may be in his custody. [Aug. 13.] General Gage in his answer afferted, that the prisoners had hitherto been treated with care and kindness. though indifcriminately, as he acknowledged no rank that was not derived from the king. He mentioned, "I understand there are of the king's faithful subjects, taken by the rebels, labouring like negro flaves, to gain their daily sublistence, or reduced to the wretched alternative to perish by famine, or take arms against their king and country." He remarked upon the passage relating to retaliation, with an appeal to God; and closed with this charge, "unfortunately for both countries, those who long fince projected the prefent crifis, and influence the councils of America, have views very distant from accommodation." General Gage was mistaken, in charging the party alluded to, with projecting the present criss, which is the casual and unexpected confequence of pernicious ministerial councils. He was no less far from the truth, while he intimated that the American leaders "have views very distant from accommodation." Some few have such views; but the great body of them, at present, long for an accommodation.

[Aug. 19.] General Washington replied to general Gage, in a pointed manner, and told him, "I have taken time, Sir, to make a strict inquiry, and find the intelligence you have received, has not the least foundation in truth. Not only your officers and foldiers have been treated with a tenderness due to fellow citizens and brethren, but even those execrable parricides, whose councils and aid have deluged their country with blood, have been protected from the fury of a justly enraged people. You affect, Sir, to despise all rank, not derived from the same source with your own. I cannot conceive one more honorable than that, which flows from the uncorrupted choice of a brave and free people, the purest fource and original fountain of all power. May that God to whom you appeal, judge between America and you! Under his providence, those who influence the councils of America, and all the other inhabitants of the united colonies, at the hazard of their lives, are determined to hand down to posterity those just and invaluable privileges which they received from their ancestors."

[Aug. 26.] At night, about two thousand of the American troops intrenched on Plow'd-hill, within point-blank shot of the British on Bunker's-hill: notwithstanding a continual fire almost all the day following, they had only two killed and two wounded. While the intrenchments were carrying on, parties of riflemen were employed in firing upon the advanced guards on Charleftown neck. One of the British officers and several men, were feen to fall. Two of the British floating batteries attempting to annoy the Americans at work upon the hill, were filenced in Mystick river, and one partly sunk. More than 300 shells were thrown at the fortress on Plow'd-hill, without a fingle person's being thereby hurt; and the confequent contempt they entertained of shells, induced them to omit providing a bomb-proof cover for the garrison. Bunker's-hill, Plow'd-hill, and Winter-hill, which last the Americans have possessed and fortified for some time, are fituated in a range from east to west, each of them on or near Mystick river. Plow'd-hill is in the middle, and the lowest of the three, the summit is about half a mile from the works on Bunker's-hill. The British finding that their firing did not answer, relaxed, and after a while desisted entirely; and the Americans remained quiet in their new post. General Washington received, in the beginning of September, a very acceptable remittance of ammunition from Rhode-Island, even 7000lb. of powder-a great quantity, compared with the late amazing fcarcity. It is probably a part of what has been brought from Afri-The Americans practifed a manœuvre, which credits their understanding. They fent out a quantity of New-England rum; which was exchanged for a fiery commodity of a different quality, fo successfully as not to leave an ounce for fale in any of the British forts on the African coast.

The general having obtained pleafing accounts from Canada; being affured that neither Indians nor Canadians could be prevailed upon to act against the Americans, and knowing there was a defign of penetrating into that province by Lake Champlain, concerted the plan of detaching a body of troops from head quarters, through the province of Mein, across the country to Quebec. He communicated the same to general Schuyler, who approving it, all things were got in readiness. The corps was to be commanded by colonel Arnold, aided by colonels Christopher Green and Roger Enos, and majors Meigs and Bigelow; and was to confift of ten companies of musket men, and three companies of rifle-men, amounting to eleven hundred.

[Sept. 13.] In the evening the detachment marched from Cambridge for Newbury-port, where, fix days after, they embarked on board ten transports, bound to Kennebec, fifty leagues distant. [Sept. 20.] They entered the mouth of the Kennebec in the morning, and favored with the wind and tide, proceeded up to Gardner's-town. It was only fourteen days from first giving orders for building 200 batteaus, for collecting provisions, and for draughting the 1100 men, to their reaching this place.—

Such was the dispatch!

[Sept. 22.] The troops embarked on board the batteaus, and proceeded to Fort Western, on the east side of the river. From thence, captain Morgan, with three companies of rifle-men, was fent forward by water, [Sept. 25.] with orders to get on to the great carrying place in the most expeditious manner, and to clear the road, while the other divisions came up. The fecond division embarked the next day, and the third the day after. they advanced up the river, the stream grew very rapid, and the bottom and shores were rocky. [Sept. 29.] By eleven in the morning, major Meigs with the third division, arrived at Fort Halisax, slanding on a point of land between the rivers Kenne-bec and Sebasticook. In their progress up the river, they met with two carrying-places, over which they were obliged to carry their batteaus, baggage, and every other article, till they came again to a part of the river which was navigable, and no longer obstructed by water-falls, rapids, rocks or other encumbrances, as was that which they avoided. [Oct. 3.] They got to Norridgewalk, where the major's curiofity was entertained, by the fight of a child 14 months old, the first white one born in the place. After croffing over more carrying-places, he and his men encamped at the great carrying-place, [Oct. 10.] which was twelve miles and a half across, including three ponds that they were obliged to pass. These ponds had plenty of trout. Two days after colonel Enos arrived at the same place with the 4th division of the army, confisting of three companies of musket men. [Oct. 13. Colonel Arnold, meeting with an Indian, wrote to general Schuyler, and inclosed his letter to a friend in Quebec. Though he had no knowledge of the Indian, he venturously intrusted the packet with him, to be carried and delivered according to order. This strange confidence may ruin his expedition, beside involving his friend in great trouble. [Oct. 15.] The provision was fo reduced, that the men were put to allowance, 3-4 lb. of pork and 3-4 lb. of flour a day for each. The next day they reached Dead river. Colonel Enos having got up with his division, in about three days, was ordered to fend back the fick, and those that could not be furnished with provision; but, contrary to colonel Arnold's expectation, returned to Cambridge with his whole division, a few days after. Major Meigs received orders to push on, with his division, [Oct. 19.] for Chaudiere head, with the greatest expedition. But they proceeded very slowly by reason of falls, carrying-places and bad weather. Their course was only three miles. [Oct. 22.] The rains made the river rife, the preceding night, in some parts, eight feet perpendicular; and in many places it overflowed its banks, and rendered it very difficult for the men on shore to march. The next day the stream was fo rapid, that, in passing it, five or fix batteaus filled and overset, by which they loft feveral barrels of provisions, a number of guns, clothes, and other articles. Such was the rapidity of the stream, and interruptions by carrying-places, that it was with much fatigue they got on one and twenty miles within the three following days. To their great fatisfaction they reached the carryingplace, [Oct. 27.] which lies across the height of land that runs through the colonies to Georgia, and on the further fide of which the streams run the reverse of the rivers they had ascended. They croffed the heights to Chaudiere river, and continued their march by land to Quebec. [Nov. 1.] The marching through the woods was extremely bad. Major Meigs passed a number of soldiers, who had no provisions, and some of whom were sick. It was not in his power to help or relieve them. But one or two dogs were killed, which the diffrested foldiers eat with a relishing appetite, without sparing either feet or skin. A few eat their cartouch-boxes, breeches and thoes, being feveral days without provision. The major and his men marched on upon the banks of the Chaudiere, [Nov. 3.] and at twelve o'clock met with supplies, to the inexpressible joy of the soldiers, who were near flarving. Colonel Arnold, with a finall party, made a forced march, and returned with provisions purchased of the inhabitants. on which the hunger-bitten adventurers made a voracious meal. [Nov. 4.] The next day at cleven, major Meigs and his men arrived at a French house, and were hospitably treated. It was the first house he had seen for 31 days, having been all that time in a rough, barren, and uninhabited wildernels, where he never faw a human being except those belonging to the detachment. He and his party were immediately supplied with fresh beef, fowls, butter, pheasants and vegetables, at this settlement called Sertigan, 25 leagues from Quebec. They were kindly entertained while marching down the country. When colonel Arnold got within two leagues and a half of Point Levi, [Nov. 8.] he wrote to general Montgomery, that as he had received no answer either from general Schuyler or his friend, he made no doubt but that the Indian had betrayed his trust: and that he was confirmed in it upon finding that the inhabitants of Quebec had been some time apprized of his coming, and had destroyed all the canoes at Point Levi, to prevent the detachments from passing over. The fact was, the Indian, inflead of delivering the packet as directed, carried it to the lieutenant-governor, who, on reading the letters, fecured Mr. Mercier the merchant, and began immediately to put the city in the best state of defence he could; whereas before it was wholly defenceless, and might easily have been carried by furprife. [Nov. 9. | Colonel Arnold arrived at Point Levi, where we leave him to remove, if possible, the embarrassments into which his own imprudence has brought him by needlessly truffing an unknown Indian with dispatches of the utmost confequence. The detachment fuffered hardships, beyond what can well be conceived of, in the course of the expedition. The men had to haul their batteaus up over falls, up rapid streams, over carrying places; and to march through morafles, thick woods, and over mountains, for about 320 miles. In many places they had to pass over the ground and the mountains several times, as without it they mull have left much of their baggage behind, and have failed in the enterprife. They loft all their powder, except what was in cartridges and horns, while penetrating through the woods. But what proved the greatest trial to them, was the starving condition to which they were reduced, when approaching the end of their tedious and diffressing march. The pork being gone. they had for four days, only half a pound of flour a day for each man. Their whole flore was then divided, which yielded about four pints of flour per man- a finall allowance for men near a hundred miles from any habitation or prospect of supply. It was used sparingly; but several when they had baked and eaten their last morfel, discovered to their great confusion, that they had thirty miles to travel before they could expect the least mouthful more. But their dread of confequences was foon removed, by the unexpected return of colonel Arnold with cattle. ers exercifed the greatest fortitude and patience under the difficulties and fufferings that occurred; and when again in the midst of plenty, and an easy situation, soon lost all painful remembrance of what had happened, and gloried in having accomplished, by their indefatigable zeal and industry, an undertaking above the common race of men in this debauched age. Let us attend to colonel Enos. His return to camp excited both aftonishment and indignation. [Dec. 1.] A court-martial was ordered to fit upon him; when it appeared, that he had but three days provision, and was about one hundred miles from the English settlements; that a council of war was called, which agreed upon the return of the colonel's whole division, and that he was for going on without, but that it was opposed. It was the unanimous opinion of the court, that colonel Enos was under a necessity of returning; and he has been acquitted with honor. A number of officers of the best character are fully satisfied, and persuaded that his conduct deserves applause rather than censure. Had he not returned, his whole division must have been starved.

We must now resume the account of the military transactions in the Maslachusetts, from the period of colonel Arnold's leaving the camp.

The Americans, that they might equal in some measure the British, have built some floating batteries with a deck, to secure the people on board from suffering by musketry. General Washington perceiving that the expence of supporting the army will by far exceed any idea formed of it in congress, is alarmed at the apprehension of consequences, and most earnestly wishes for such a termination of the campaign, as may make the army no longer necessary. The want of powder has subsided in part. Salt-petre is made in every colony. Powder-mills have been erected at Philadelphia and New-York. Not only so, but upward of a hundred barrels of powder have been taken out of the magazine at Bermuda, as supposed by a sloop from Philadelphia, and a schooner from Carolina. It was easily accomplished from from the magazine's being stuated far distant from the town, without any dwelling house in the vicinity. Some of the inhabitants were probably concerned in the transaction. It might be connected with the address of the deputies from the different parishes of Bermuda presented to congress in July, and might influence the subsequent resolve of congress in November, "That the inhabitants of Bermuda appear friendly to the cause of America, and ought to be supplied with such a quantity of the produce of these colonies, as may be necessary for their subsistence

Oct. The perfidy of Dr. Church has been at length detected by the discovery of a traiterous correspondence with a British officer in Boston. He had intrusted a letter in cypher with, his kept millrefs, to be forwarded; which being found upon her, she was taken and carried to head quarters. The Doctor not being suspected, had an opportunity of speaking to her, so that she would not discover the writer, till terrified into it by the severest threats. The general was thocked at the discovery, and talked with the doctor upon the basencss of his conduct. marks of guilt were apparent. The doctor was confounded, and never attempted to vindicate himself. He was immediately secured. Since the letter has been decyphered, and the doctor has had opportunity of recollecting himfelf, he has pleaded that his intentions were not criminal; admitting his plea, fo gross a piece of stupidity in so sensible a man is quite a prodigy. But this plea was invalidated, though not by the contents of the letter, which ferved mainly to point out the necessity of a speedy accommodation; yet by the marks of guilt he discovered in the presence of the general, and in his attempt to conceal the writer, instead of declaring at once who he was, what was his defign, and what he had written. The doctor being a representative was, on the 27th of October, examined at the bar of the house. He endeavoured to evade the censure of the house, by infishing, that as the affair would be before another court where the matter must have a final issue, should the house proceed to expel him it would have a fatal effect whenever a final judgement was to be given on his conduct. He made the most solemn appeal to heaven, that the letter was written with the defign of procuring fome important intelligence. He observed, that there was not a fingle paragraph in it, which contained information that could hurt the Americans; and that the exaggerated accounts of their force, firength and unanimity, tended to dishearten the enemy, and keep them quiet, at a time when the Americans were poorly able to have withflood a vigorous attack. It is impossible to write all he faid, but if the force of rhetoric and the powers of language;

if the most pathetic arts of persuasion, enforced by all the ingenuity, sense, and spirit of the dostor, could have made him innocent, he would have appeared spotless as an angel of light.—The house however expelled him as guilty; and congress afterward resolved, "That he be close confined in some secure jail in Connecticut, without the use of pen, ink and paper, and that no person be allowed to converse with him, except in the presence and hearing of a magistrate or the sherisf of the county."

The time for which the continental foldiers were engaged to ferve, was hastening to a close; the evil of a very short inlistment was felt; it was therefore unanimously agreed at a council of war, [O&. 8.] that the men to be raised for the future army, should be engaged to the first of December 1776, but be discharged sooner if necessary. Hopes still remain, that an accommodation

[October 10.] General Gage failed for Great-Britain, leaving feveral thousand of the inhabitants of the town in want of bread and every necessary of life. Before his departure, he was addressed by his majesty's mandamus council; by a number of gentlemen and principal inhabitants of the town; and by fuch as were driven from their habitations in the country to Boston; amounting to no more than feventy-fix, a fmall number confidering the extent and populousness of the colony, and that many of them would not pass for gentlemen in Great-Britain. The command of the army devolved of course upon general Howe, who iffued one proclamation, condemning to military execution fuch inhabitants as attempt to quit the town without a written licence, if detected and taken; if they escape, they are to be proceeded against is traitors, and their effects are to be forfeited: and another, declaring that if fuch as are permitted to depart, attempt carrying away more than five pounds in specie, to which fum they have been restrained for some time past, they shall forfeit the whole sum discovered, beside suffering fine and imprisonment.

Congress having intimated to general Washington, that an attack upon Boston was much defined, a council of war was called, [October 18.] but unanimously agreed that it was not expedient, at least, for the present. On the same day captain Mowat destroyed 139 houses, and 278 stores and other buildings, the far greatest and best part of the town of Falmouth in the northern part of the Massachusetts. The inhabitants, in compliance with a resolve of the provincial congress to prevent tories carrying out their effects, gave some violent obstruction to the loading of a mass ship, which drew upon them the indignation of the admiral. Captain Mowat was dispatched in the Canceaux of fixteen guns, with an armed large ship, schooner and floop. After anchoring toward the evening of the feventeenth, within gun shot, he sent a letter on shore, giving them two hours for the removal of their families, as he had orders to fire the town, they having been guilty of the most unpardonable rebellion. A committee of three gentlemen went on board, to learn the particular reasons for such orders. He answered, that his orders were to fet on fire all the fea-ports between Boston and Halifax; but agreed to spare the town till nine o'clock the next morning, would they consent to fend him off eight small arms; which was immediately done. The next morning the committee applied afresh; he concluded to spare the town till he could hear from the admiral, in case they would fend him off four carriage guns, deliver up all their arms, ammunition, &c. and four gentlemen of the town as hostages. That not being complied with, about half past nine he began to fire from the four armed vessels, and continued it till after dark. With shells and carcases, and about thirty marines whom he landed, he set the town on fire in feveral places. About a hundred of the worst houses escaped destruction, but suffered damage. The inhabitants got out a very confiderable part of their furniture, and had not a person killed or wounded, though the vessels fired into the town about three thousand shot, beside bombs and carcases. General Lee reprobates their cowardice, in admitting fuch a paltry party to land with impunity, and fet their town in flames, when they had at least two hundred fighting men, and powder enough for a battle. In the private letter, wherein he expressed these sentiments, he made no mention of the failors being repulfed with the loss of a few men; though this might happen in the close of the day, and give occasion for its being related by others. The burning of Falmouth spread an alarm upon the sea coast, but produced no disposition to submit to the power and mercy of the armed British agents. The people in common chose rather to ahandon the fea-ports that could not be defended, than quit their country's cause; and therefore removed back, with their effects to a fafe distance.

The congress, the latter end of September, concluded upon fending a committee of three members to confer with general Washington and the governor of Connecticut, the lieutenant governor of Rhode-Island, the council of Massachusetts, and the president of the convention of New-Hampshire and others, touching the most effectual method of continuing, supporting and regulating a continental army. They met and agreed on the measures to be pursued. Dr. Franklin being one of the committee, the Massachusetts general court embraced that opportunity [Oct. 23.] of ordering the treasurer to pay him 1854l. sterling, in full for his late services as agent, from October 31, 1770, to March 1, 1775. You may recollect that governor Hutchinfon always refused figning the grants made him by the house of assembly. The doctor might have liked specie at the time such grants were made, better than the present paper money; but his foresight will undoubtedly transform the latter into some solid substance: he had to pay 100l. of it back into the hands of a committee, appointed to wait upon him within a day or two, being the amount of a sum sent by several persons from England, for the relief of those Americans who were wounded in the battle of Lexington, and of the widows and children of those who were then slain.

[October 27.] The old fouth meeting-house, a large handfome brick building, well fitted up without and within, was taken possession of and destined for a horse riding school, and the fervice of the light dragoons. It is faid and believed, that an offer was made of building a complete riding school for less money than it would cost to remove the pews and the fide galleries (the front remains for the accommodation of tea-company and others) and to make a proper flooring for the horfe. clearing every thing away, a beautiful carved pew, with filk furniture, formerly belonging to a deceafed gentleman in high eftimation, was taken down and carried to Mr. John Amory's house, by the order of an officer, who applied the carved work to the erecting of a hogsty. Had the meeting-house and its contents been honored with episcopal confecration, these proceedings would be deemed by multitudes profane and facrilegious.-But they, who in the present day hold not with the holiness of any buildings, will centure the infults offered professors of whatever denomination, by neednessly demolithing their places of worship, or configning them to despicable and filthy uses. When Roman virtue and patriotism were at their height, the Roman officers would not allow the religion or temples of the persons with whom they fought to be infulted and profaned. They were more politic than to exasperate men into a ferocious courage for the defence of their altars. But too many of the present British officers act as though they owed a spite to all the meeting-houses of the Presbyterians, by which common name they stigmatize those who diffent from the church of England, without reflecting that it is no stigma in Scotland, but the reverse.

The fouthern colonies, in confequence of accounts transmitted to them from the camp, begin to entertain prejudices with respect to the troops raised in the Massachusetts. They ought to allow for the precipitation with which the army was necessarily collectsed. General Thomas declared, [Oct. 24.] that the regiments at Roxbury were equal, as to the privates, to any with whom he ferved the last war, and many of them have proved themselves brave. The greatest part of the officers are unexperienced, and in general unqualified, being strangers to subordination, which was not unexpected to the general, as they were chosen by their privates. He complained of many of the fouthern riflemen, that they often deferted to the enemy, were mutinous, repugnant to all kind of duty, and so exceedingly vicious, that the army would be as well without them; but spake with satisfaction of their officers. It is a mortifying truth, that some of the Massachusetts officers differace the colony, by practifing the meanest arts of peculation. Every fubtilty that avarice can invent or rafcality carry on, are used to cheat the public by men who procured commissions, not to fight for the liberty of their country, but to prey upon its distresses. The army about to be inlisted will undoubtedly be better officered.

Gentlemen, ladies and others, from neighbouring and distant colonies, attracted by curiofity, have visited the American troops. and animated them by their presence. A number of Indian chiefs have also been down, that they might see and judge for themselves, how far the reports propagated among them were true or false. They were treated at head quarters, and by different officers, with much respect. One evening they entertained the general and others with a war dance, if that may be called an entertainment, wherein the motions and actions of the dancers were calculated to alarm and terrify those who were not acquainted with fuch fights. They were pleafant and agreeable company. Two of them had their fquaws or wives with them: who were well looking women, allowing for their dark complexion: one of them was much dejected, having lately loft her papoos or child. When the Indians danced in company with the American gentlemen and ladies, both men and women kept time with far greater exactness than the others. They went off upon their return; fully fatisfied with the treatment they had received; and it is hoped will carry back those accounts which will keep their tribes peaceable.

Many of the Americans have fickened and died of the dyfentery, brought upon them, in a great measure, through an inattention to cleanliness. When at home, their female relations put them upon washing their hands and faces, and keeping themfelves neat and clean: but being absent from such monitors, through an indolent heedless turn of mind, they have neglected

[Nov. 2.] The weather fet in very cold, and the foldiers were diffrested for want of wood. The building of barracks had been delayed too long; and they were not in sufficient forwardness to admit and accommodate all the troops. Several regiments were obliged to keep the field; and some in a bleak position on the brow of hills, where it was difficult to drag up the wood with which they could be supplied. It is mortifying to reslect how these supplies have been reduced by short measure. But many persons think it no harm in this way to cheat the united colonies, and to deliver a less quantity than they are paid for.

Nov. 9.] Several companies of the British regulars passed over from Charlestown to Phipp's farm, and kept possession of the ground for near an hour before they could be obstructed, owing to a high tide, that prevented the Americans crossing the caufeway, which was overflowed. During this period they were employed in shooting cattle with the design of carrying them off, At length a battalion of riflemen, under colonel Thomson, took to the water, when up to their middles, and a quarter of a mile acros; at their approach the British hastened to their boats.— The Charlestown forts, one in Boston and a frigate, kept up a warm fire upon the Americans the whole time, killed them one man and wounded three. The British have provided for the security of Charlestown, by the erection of a strong citadel on Bunker's hill, with convenient barracks for the garrison. [Nov. 16.] Such was the distress of the inhabitants in Boston, that fences, trees, houses, &c. were taken down and carried off for fuel: beef, mutton and pork, were 1s. 1 1-2d. flerling per lb. geefe half a guinea a piece, and fowls five shillings. At the scarcest feafon half a guinea was given for a dozen of common eggs.

General Washington, desirous of improving the troops to the utmost, ere the army was weakened by the return of the Connecticut ones to their own colony, resolved upon securing Cobble, or Miller's-hill, about half a mile in a direct line from the enemy's works on Bunker's-hill, and at a like distance from the shipping at West Boston. About 1000 men broke ground on the hill, [Nov. 22.] without having a single cannon fired at them. They went on intrenching and planting several 9, 18, and 24 pounders, till they made themselves secure. General Howe does not seem so fond of cannonading as was general Gage. [Oct. 24.] To lessen the demand for provision, he ordered a transport ship to carry about 400 of the inhabitants out of the town to Point Shirley, to be taken care of by the country. Ten days after he sent out 300 more. The persons thus sent out were not thought to be wholly free from the finall-pox; and it was suspected that there might be a defign of spreading that disorder among the American troops, which induced the Massachusetts assembly to

The Massachusetts assembly resolved, October the ninth, to fit out armed veffels; which proving a fufficient encouragement for individuals to apply themselves to that business, and some being in proper forwardness, an act was passed in November for granting letters of marque and reprifal, and the establishment of courts of admiralty. The declared intention of the act was for the defence of the American coast, and the condemnation of those vessels only which should be proved to be the property of, or in any wife employed, by the enemies of the united colonies, or for supplying faid enemies. The Lee privateer, captain Manly, belonging to Marblehead, was foon at fea, and took the brig Nancy, [Nov. 29.] an ordnance ship from Woolwich, containing befide a large brafs mortar upon a new construction, several pieces of fine brafs cannon, a large quantity of fmall arms and ammunition, with all manner of tools, utenfils and machines, necessary for camps and artillery, in the greatest abundance. General Washington, but thirteen days before wrote, "I am in very great want of powder, lead, mortars, indeed of most forts of military flores." Had congress sent an order for articles most wanted, they could not have made a more satisfactory invoice. The mortar is now at Cambridge, in the park of artillery; is named the Congress, and is much admired for its fize by every spectator, whether acquainted or not with the uses for hi chit is designed. About two months before this capture, a fhip from Bristol with flour for Boston, having parted with her convoy, was decoyed into Portsmouth in New-Hampshire, and fecured for the benefit of the Americans.

(Dec. 8.) Three ships from London, Glasgow, and Liverpool, with various stores for the army, and a brig from Antigua with rum, were taken in the bay by captain Manly, by whale boats, &c. A number of men in whale boats can overpower unarmed vessels, and carry them off into secure harbours. These and the privateers captured several more store ships before sive days were ended. Among the privateers were some continental ones, for general Washington sitted out a few armed vessels, which has met with the approbation of congress. These repeated and considerable captures have increased the distress of the troops and people in Boston, and furnished the continental army with many valuable articles. But though the success of the Americans upon the watery element has been matter of joy and triumph, their affairs upon land do not answer the wishes of the genuine patriots. On the first of the month the inlistment of the Connecticut troops expired. They were urged to tarry longer by different perfous, who harrangued them upon the occasion. A few hundreds were prevailed upon to continue; but the main body marched off, leaving the army in too weak a condition. It is true, they had fuffered greatly through the intenfeness of the cold, and the want of fuel, with which they ought to have been more faithfully and punctually supplied. The Massachufetts and New-Hampshire men complete their term, the first of January; and the inliftment of the new army goes on very heavily. There is a general reluctance among the foldiers to inlifting afresh. The Massachusetts people show as much backwardness as the others. In fhort, they expect to be hired, and that at a very high price, to defend their own liberties; and choose to be flaves unless they can be bribed to be freemen. Quid facit libertas, cum sola pecunia regnat? How must it afflict general Washington to observe in the present crisis, so little of that patriotic. spirit, which he was taught to believe was the characteristic of the Maffachufetts people; and on which he relied greatly for support. While burdened with an apprehension that he might possibly be deserted, he could recollect the severity of the season, and the distresses of his fellow creatures at a distance, and wrote to the gentleman with whom he had intrusted the management of his concerns at Mount Vernon, " Let the hospitality of the house be kept up with respect to the poor. Let no one go hungry away. If any of this kind of people should be in want of corn, fupply their necessities, provided it does not encourage them in idleness. I have no objection to your giving my money in charity, when you think it will be well bestowed. I mean, it is my defire that it should be done. You are to consider, that neither myself or wife are now in the way to do these good offices."

[Dec. 11.] About 2000 militia arrived in camp, and 3000 more were expected every hour, making in the whole the number required by the general to supply the deficiency of the continental regiments. The American army being by this mean sufficiently strengthened, carried their approaches to within half a mile of Boston, and broke ground at Lechinere's point, which brought on a cannonade from the batteries of Charlestown and Barton's point, that continued for four days, without obliging them to defist. Their labor was hard, owing to the ground's being so frozen; but they persevered till they had persected their design.

bridge fide of the American lines, and on the Roxbury, as alfo, the number and nature of their firings. The account stands thus, From the burning of Charlestown down to this day, the enemy have fired upward of 2000 shot and shells, an equal number of 24 pounders with any other fort. They threw more than 300 bombs at Plowed-hill, and 100 at Lechmere's point. By the whole firing on Cambridge side, they killed only seven, and on

Roxbury fide five, just a dozen."

Let me now give you the following anecdote. Deacon Whitcomb of Lancaster, (who was a member of the Massachusetts affembly till the prefent contest, had served in former wars, and been in different engagements) has ferved as a colonel in the American army; but on account of his age was left out upon the late new regulation. His men highly refented it, and declared they would not inlift again, after their time was out. The colonel told them, he did not doubt there were fufficient reasons for the regulation, and he was fatisfied with it; he then blamed them for their conduct, and faid he would inlift as a private. A colonel Brewer heard of it, and offered to refign in favor of colonel Whitcomb. The whole coming to general Washington's ears, he has allowed of colonel Brewer's refignation in colonel Whitcomb's favor, appointed the former barrack-master, till he can further promote him, and acquainted the army with the whole affair in general orders. This terminates the narrative of the military and naval transactions within the Massachusetts; little remains to be mentioned of the civil. The great call there was for falt-petre, put the house of assembly upon resolving [Oct. 32.] to pay a bounty of three shillings sterling in paper currency per lb. for all that shall be manufactured before the first of next, June, beside two shillings and three-pence per lb. purchase money. The affembly was far from giving fatisfaction to general Lee, who about the middle of November, pronounced them benumbed in a fixed state of torpitude, without the symptoms of animation, unless an apprehension of rendering themselves unpopular among their particular conflituents, by any act of vigor for the public service, deserved the name of animation. He charged them with inconfissent and timid conduct; and ascribed it to their torpor, narrow politics, or call it what you will, that the army had been reduced to very great distress. There was however, about the beginning of December, an act passed for emitting bills of credit to the amount of more than 50,000l. fterling, with a pretty device on the back, viz. an American with a fword in his right hand, with the following inscription suspended therefrom, " Ense petit placidam sub libertate quietem;" and from his left hand "Magna Charta;" and round the figure thefe words, "Is Ined in defence of American liberty." The affembly also gave orders relating to wood (Dec. 26.) that so the great

New-Hampshire colony has presented us with a novelty, which the politicians will apply to the purpose of promoting independency. By some dextrous, or rather finisher management, inflructions were delivered to the New-Hampshire delegates at the continental congress containing these expressions, "we would have you immediately use your utmost endeavours to obtain the advice and direction of the congress, with respect to a method for our administering justice and regulating our civil police. We press you not to delay this matter, as its being done speedily will probably prevent the greatest confusion among us." They were laid before congress October the eighteenth, and proved a fine opening for those individual delegates, who were looking forward to a separation from Great-Britain, to introduce an entering wedge wherewith to divide the empire. Even these very instructions might be designedly obtained by considertial letters written to trusty deputies in the New-Hampshire convention, by certain delegates in the general congress. The first step to be taken by fuch was, to procure, in some one colony, the establithment of a new form of government, in which the people at large should have a leading influence, that so their attachments and efforts might be secured in support of the same. The inhabitants of adjoining colonies would foon be eager to enjoy the like power and importance, which would pave the way for their infilting also upon a change. These changes being once effected, the parties will then have gone too far to retreat, and must feek their fecurity in independence. The scheme met with opposition, and the New-Hampshire delegates used unwearied importunity, both within doors and without, before they obtained the recommendation they were after. At length the report of the committee was taken into confideration, and it was refolved by congress, [Nov. 3.] "That it be recommended to the provincial convention of New-Hampshire, to call a full and free representation of the people, and that the faid representatives, if they think it necessary, establish such a form of government, as in their judgment will best produce the happiness of the people, and most effectually secure the peace and good order in the province, during the continuance of the present dispute between Great-Britain and the colonies." The vote was far from being unanimous; and, in order to make it pass, was qualified with a feeining defire of an accommodation with Britain, and of restoration by that mean to the old form of government. The provincial convention, without waiting for the arrvial of the recommendation, mendation, appointed a committee to report a mode of representation; which being laid before them, [Nov. 14.] they agreed that precepts be fent to elect persons to represent the towns, &c. in congress, to meet at Exeter on the twenty-first of December, and to be empowered to profecute fuch measures as they may deem necessary for the public good, during the term of one year, nnless they see fit to dissolve themselves sooner. And in case there should be a recommendation from the continental congress for this colony to assume a government, in a way that will require a house of representatives, that the faid congress of this colony be empowered to refolve themselves into such a house as may be recommended, and remain such for the aforesaid term of one year." The provincial congress met agreeable to the receipts, and after a while voted, "That congress will at any time take up civil government, to continue during the present contest with Great-Britain; and resolve themselves into a house of representatives, and then choose a council to continue one year from the twentyfirst of December."

The continental congress having dispatched the New-Hamp-Thire case, immediately took into consideration the state of South-Carolina, and appointed a committee to confider a number of papers relative thereto, and to report what in their opinion was necessary to be done. What this opinion would be was easily foreseen from Messrs. Chase and Samuel Adams being of the committee. The report was brought in the next day, [Nov. 4.] and it was resolved, "That for the defence of South-Carolina, there be kept up in that colony, at the continental expence, three battalions of foot :- That if the convention, or council of fafety shall think it expedient; for the fecurity of the colony, to feize or destroy any ship or vessel of war, this congress will approve of fuch proceeding:-That Charlestown ought to be defended against any attempts to take possession thereof by the enemies of America; and that the convention or council of fafety ought to proceed immediately to creet such fortifications and batteries, as will best conduce to its security: - That if the convention of South-Carolina shall find it necessary to establish a form of government in that colony, it be recommended to that convention to call a full and free representation of the people, &c. &c." as to the convention of New-Hampshire.

The measures pursued by lord Dunmore naturally led congress to resolve, [Nov. 10.] "That a committee be appointed to inquire into the state of the colony of Virginia, to consider what provisions may be necessary for its defence, and to report the same." Mr. Samuel Adams was of the number. New information being received before they reported, when they did it, it was in such a way that congress resolved, [Dec. 4.] That three companies of the Pennsylvania battalion immediately march into Northampton county, in Virginia, for the protection of the association:—That it be recommended to the inhabitants to resist to the utmost the arbitrary government intended to be established therein." They then said, "Whereas lord Dunmore by his proclamation, has declared his intention to execute martial law, thereby tearing up the foundations of civil authority and government within the colony; resolved, therefore, that if the convention of Virginia, &c. &c." as, to the conventions of New-Hampshire and South-Carolina.

A growing change in the fentiments of congress would of course follow, upon the dispatches received the day before the committee on the state of Virginia was appointed. Their agents informed them, that the American minister told them, some days after the delivery of the petition by the late governor Penn, No answer will be given to it; and that no one person in authority had, since the arrival of that gentleman, deigned to propose a single question to him, or to desire the smallest information from him. This cavalier treatment, of a petition containing professions of the greatest loyalty to the king and attachment to the mother country, and couched in terms the most moderate and humble; and of the person who was intrusted with it; lest no reasonable ground for hoping that the present dispute could be amicably adjusted.

Having been led, by the New-Hampshire instructions, to mention some of the doings of congress, let me proceed to relate fome others which have been unnoticed.

Congress resolved that the new army intended to lie before Boston, [Nov. 4.] confist of 20,372 men, officers included. Befide, it has been recommended to particular colonies to raise battalions at the expence of the continent. Orders have also been given for fitting out four armed vessels, for the intercepting of fuch transports as may be laden with warlike stores and other supplies for the enemy; and for the protection and defence of the United Colonies. [Nov. 9.] It was agreed, "That every member consider himself under the ties of virtue, honor and love of his country, not to divulge, directly or indirectly, any matter or thing agitated or debated in congress before the same shall have been determined, without the leave of congress; or any other matter or thing determined in congress, which the majority of congress shall order to be kept secret; and that, if any member shall violate this agreement, he shall be expelled this congress, and be deemed an enemy to the liberties of America, and liable to be weated as fuch; and that every member fignify his confent to this VOL. I.

agreement by figning the fame." [Nov. 10.] They refolved upon raising two battalions of marines, to be considered as part of the number of which the continental army before Boilon is to confift.

[Nov. 28.] A committee appointed to take into confideration the flate of North-Carolina, made their report, whereupon it was relolved, among other matters, that two ministers of the gospel he applied to, to go immediately among the regulators and highlanders of that colony, for the purpose of informing them of the nature of the present dispute between Great-Britain and the colonies. Inflead of a firrilar recommendation to what was given to South-Carolina about establishing a form of government, it was only recommended to the convention or committee of fafety, in case the method of defending the colony by minute-men be inadequate to the purpole, to substitute such other mode as to them should appear most likely to effect the security of the colony.

[Nov. 20.] Congress resolved, that a committee of five be appointed for the fole purpose of corresponding with their friends in Great-Britain, Ireland and other parts of the world. Information being given, that there is a large quantity of powder in the island of Providence, the secret committee were ordered to take measures for securing and bringing away the said powder. prevent any petition to the king from a particular colony, they declared, [Dec. 4.] that in the present situation of affairs, it would be very dangerous to the liberties and welfare of America, if any colony should separately petition the king, or either house of parliament. This declaration is thought to be owing to an apprebenfion, that the New-Jersey affembly would be drawn in, by the art and perfuafion of governor Franklin and his adherents, to adopt fuch a measure. Congress were certainly alarmed at some disagreeable appearances, for they appointed a committee to confer with that affembly, immediately after the declaration. [Dec. 6.] They agreed to the report of the committee on proclamations. It contained many fevere remarks upon the royal proclamation of August, for suppressing rebellion and sedition; together with many pointed questions defigned to fink it into equal contempt with what is experienced at the Royal Exchange, where we have heard it was read by one of the lord mayor's officers, accompanied only by the common crier, without horse or mace to grace the ceremony, and when finished, faluted with a general hiss. Toward the close, the report holds forth the following threat; "We, in the name of the people of these United Colonies, and by authority, according to the pureft maxims of reprefentation, derived from them, declare, that whatever punishment shall be infli acd flicted upon any persons in the power of our enemies for savoring, aiding, or abetting the cause of American liberty, shall be retaliated in the same kind and the same degree upon those in our power, who have savored, aided, or abetted, or shall savor, aid, or abet the fystem of ministerial oppression."

[Dec. 13.] Congress determined upon building five ships of 32 guns, five of 28, and three of 24, in all 13; one in New. Hampshire, two in Massachusetts, one in Connecticut, two in Rhode-Island, two in New-York, four in Pennsylvania, and one in Maryland. [Dec. 20.] They, having taken into confideration the dispute between the people of Pennsylvania and Connecticut on the lands near Wyoming, on the Susquehannah river, recommended that "the contending parties immediately cease all hostilities; that all persons seized and detained on account of faid dispute, on either fide, be dismissed and permitted to go to their respective homes; and that, things being put in the same fituation they were before the late unhappy contest, they continue to behave themselves peaceably, until a legal decision can be had on faid dispute, or congress thall take further order thereon." The committee appointed to fit out armed vessels, having procured a few, laid before congress [Dec. 22.] a lift of the officers by them appointed; and were directed to give fuch instructions to the commander of the fleet, Ezekiel Hopkins, esq; touching the operations of the ships under his command, as should appear to them most conducive to the defence of the United Colonies, and to the distress of the enemy's naval forces and vessels.

In Canada, Sir Guy Carleton was no fooner acquainted with the Americans having furprifed Tyconderoga and Crown-point, and obtained the command of Lake Champlain, than he planned a scheme for their recovery. The British troops he had with him were too few to admit of their being drawn out of garrison. He expected a fupply of Canadians sufficient for his purpose; and to have the affiftance of the Indians in his intended operations: but both failed him. He established martial law in the province, that he might be able in that way authoritatively to force the people to take arms; but they refused. They had tasted the sweets of the English mode of government, since the conquest of the country; and were disgusted (the noblesse excepted) at the re-cstablishment of the French. The Quebec act was of no use in exciting them against the colonists; on the contrary they talked much of liberty *. They declared themselves ready to defend the province; but absolutely refused to march out of it, and commence hostilities upon their neighbours. The governor applied to the bishop of Quebec, to use his spiritual influence, and particularly to issue an epifcopal mandate to be read by the parish priests in the time of divine fervice, but the bishop excused himself. The ecclesiaffics, in the place of this, iffued their letters, which were how-ever, greatly diffugarded. The nobleffe alone, who were chiefly confidered in the Quebec-act, showed a zeal against the English colonists.

Colonel Johnson, a son of the late Sir William Johnson, had repeated conferences with the Indians; at the one in Montreal, he defivered to each of the Canadian tribes a war belt and the hatchet; after which he invited them to feast on a Bostonian and to drink his blood, figuratively, an ox being roafted for the purpose, and a pipe of wine given: but the entertainment could not prevail with them to take up the hatchet. The congress, being made acquainted with the disposition of the Canadians, and the deligns of governor Carleton, and expecting a powerful oppofition from that quarter, when European troops were arrived, unless they could prevent it by securing the country, determined upon penetrating into Canada, in hope of gaining the speedy possession of it, and of joining it to the union. The more effectually to support the reasonableness of the measure, and to strengthen the operation, it was given out, that the powers, with which governor Carleton was intrufted by his commission, were special and extraordinary, purpofely defigned to warrant his attempting by force to suppress the opposition making in the colonies to the British measures. Several or even most of the members of congress could not but know, that the words of the commission for governing their own colonies, name and place excepted. Sir Guy's commission was in the usual mode, and similar to what was given to Danvers Osborne, esq; governor of New-York*.

General Montgomery was fent forward to Tyconderoga with a body of troops, Now-Yorkers and New-Englanders. When he took leave of his lady, his parting words were, "You shall never blush for your Montgomery." [Aug. 21.] He arrived with the continental army (if not too diminutive to be so called) at the place of destination. General Schuyler, who was the chief commander, remained at Albany to attend the Indian treaty carrying on in that city. General Montgomery made a movement down Lake Champlain, without waiting the arrival of more troops; that fo he might hinder the enemy's armed veffels getting into the lake. [Sept. 4, 5.] Schuyler having pushed forward, notwithstanding great indisposition, and joined Montgomery at Ifle la Motte, they moved on and arrived at Isle aux Noix. Here he drew up a declaration, which he fent among the Canadians by colonel Allen and major Brown, affuring them, that the army was defigned only against the English garrisons, and not the country, their liberties or religion. [Sept. 6.] The army, not exceeding a thousand men, proceeded without any obstruction toward St. John's. When in fight of the works, and about two miles dislant, the enemy began to fire, without doing any damage. After advancing half a mile nearer, the troops landed without opposition, in a close deep swamp; and being formed, marched through grounds marshy and covered with woods, in order to reconnoitre the fortreifes. The left was attacked in croffing a creek, by a party of Indians, who killed a fearjeant, corporal, and three privates, befide wounding eight, three of whom died. Three officers also were wounded. The Indians were foon compelled to give way, and had five killed and four badly wounded. Gen. Schuyler receiving certain intelligence in the evening, that the enemy's fortifications were complete, and plentifully furnished with cannon, it was thought advisable the next morning, to return to Isle aux Noix, which was accordingly done; and the troops were employed in erecting proper works to secure the entrance into the lake; and in getting ready, on the arrival of further reinforcements, to take advantage of any events that might happen in Canada. Schuyler returned, leaving the command to Montgomery; who, being strengthened by an addition of men and artillery, and receiving orders to undertake the fiege of St. John's, [Sept. 17.] proceeded to execute the same. The next day the enemy threw bombs, but did no damage. The Americans returned the falute. [Sept. 21.] The lines of circumvallation were finished; but between 20 and 30 waggons with provifions, ruin, brandy, &c. for the garrison, were taken prior to it. Afterward there was a continual firing for some days and nights; and could the general have depended upon the troops, he might have ventured to promife fuccels, but he could fay nothing pleafing on that head. The men took good care of themselves; and one night capt. Mott, of the 1st regiment of Yorkers, basely deferted the mortar battery without ever being attacked.

Colonel Allen being upon his return, with a guard of about eighty men, from a tour upon which he had been fent by the general, was defired to halt by major Brown, who proposed that colonel Allen should return to Longueil, procure canoes and cross the river St. Lawrence a little north of Montreal; while he crossed a little to the south of the town with near 200 men, as he had boats sufficient. The plan was approved of, and colonel Allen crossed in the night. Major Brown by some means failed on his part; and colonel Allen found himfelf, the next morning, in a critical fituation; but concluded upon maintaining his ground. [Sept. 25.] General Carleton learning how weak colonel Allen was, marched out against him with about forty regulars, together with Canadians, English and Indians. amounting to some hundreds. The colonel defended himself with much bravery; but being deserted by several, chiefly Canadians, and having had fifteen of his men killed, was under the necessity of surrendering with thirty-one effectives and seven wounded. He was directly put into irons. Had the plan been executed according to major Brown's proposal, Montreal would probably have been surprised and taken. Success would have prevented the censures, which are now passed upon the one for proposing, and the other for adopting a plan of operation to which the general was an entire stranger. Oct. 4.] A party of Canadians, who had joined and greatly affished the besiegers, intrenched themselves on the east side of the lake, on which the enemy fent an armed floop with troops to drive them away; but the Canadians attacked the floop with vigor, killed a number of the men, and obliged her to return to St. John's in a shattered The main body of the army decamped from the fouth, [Oct. 7.] and marched to the north fide of the fort; and in the evening began to throw up a breast work, in order to erect a battery of cannon and mortars. The continental troops brought fuch a spirit of liberty into the field, and thought so freely for themselves, that they would not bear either subordination or discipline. The general could not in truth direct their operations, and would not have flayed an hour at their head, had he not feared that the example would be too generally followed and so the public service suffer. There was a great want of powder, which with the diforderly behaviour of the troops was a damp to the hope of terminating the fiege fuccessfully.

[Oct. 18.] The prospect was much brightened. The Canadians planned an attack upon Chamblee, and carried down in batteaus the artillery, past the fort of St. John's. After a short demur it surrendered to major Brown and major Livingston.—The greatest acquisition was about six tons of powder, which enabled the general to accomplish his wishes. The other particulars you have below *, except the colours of the 7th regiment, which were immediately transmitted to congress—the first prefent of the kind they ever received. The garrison became prifoners of war, but were allowed all their baggage, the quantity of which was aftonishing. Their women and children, whose number was equally aftonishing, were permitted to go with them and to take their effects. The besiegers having obtained a full fupply of ainmunition, went to work in earnest, completed a battery within 250 yards of the fort, and mounted in it Oct. 30. four guns and fix mortars, in defiance of the continual fire of the enemy. While the army was builty engaged in preparing for a cannonade, and an allault if necessary, they received the agreeable news of governor Carleton's being repulfed. 31. The governor, with a view of railing the fiege, collected a body of about 800 forces, confisting of the militia of Montreal, a number of Canadians, whom he had maintained for fome time, a few troops, not a hundred, and fome Indians. They left Montreal in high spirits, and attempted to cross the river St. Lawrence, and land at Longueil; but colonel Warner, with 300 Green Mountain boys, and a four pounder which kept pouring grape shot into the boats, prevented their making good a landing. They were suffered to come very near the shore. and then the fire was so hot and destructive, that they were thrown into great confusion, and retired with the utmost precipitation. (November 1.) The batteries kept an inceffant fire all day on the garrifon of St. John, which returned a very brik one.—In the evening, general Montgomery fent a flag, with a letter to major Preston the commander, by one of the prisoners taken by colonel Warner, informing him of governor Carleton's defeat, and recommending to him the furrender of the fort, as he could now have no longer reason to expest relief from that quarter. Major Preston in return sent an officer to the camp, proposing to answer the letter fully in the morning, and that in the mean time hostilities should cease on both sides. Two officers came into the camp (Nov. 2.) with an answer from major Preston, who requested the general to wait four days, to fee whether no relief would come in that time, and if not, they would make proposals for a furrender. The advanced season of the year, did not allow of the general's complying. He required them to furrender immediately prisoners of war; but referred them for the truth of the governor's defeat to another prisoner. It was at length agreed that the garrison should march out with the honors of war, as what was due to their fortitude and perseverance. The non-commissioned officers and privates were to ground their arms on the plain; the officers were to keep their fide arms, and their fire arms were to be referved for them. The effects of the garrison were not to be withheld withheld from them. The Canadian gentlemen and others at St. John's were confidered as part of the garrifon; which amounted to about 500 regulars, and better than 100 Canadian volunteers. The next morning they marched out, (Nov. 31.) and the continental troops took possession of the fort; in which were 17 brass ordinance from 2 to 24 pounders, 2 eight inch howitzers, 7 mortars, and 22 iron ordnance from 3 to 9 pounders, a considerable quantity of shot and small shells, and about 800 stand of small arms, beside a small quantity of naval stores. The ammunition and provision was trisling, these having been

General Montgomery preffed on to Montreal. It being capable of making no defence, governor Carleton quitted it in one day; the general entered it the next, [Nov. 124] He treated the inhabitants with becoming liberality, engaging upon his honor to maintain the individuals and religious communities of the city in the peaceable enjoyment of their property of évery kind; and the inhabitants, whether English, French, or others, in the free exercise of their religion. The general, in all his transactions, wrote, spake, and behaved with that attention, regard and politeness, to both privates and officers, foldiers and citizens, which might be expected from the gentleman. He was careful to push forward in time a number of continental troops under colonel Easton to the point of Sorel River, which they guarded fo with cannon, an armed gondola, and their fire arms, that the fleet which had fallen down below Montreal, would not venture to attempt passing it. General Prescot, who was on board with about 120 privates and feveral officers, was reduced to the necessity of furrendering by capitulation, [Nov. 17.] eleven fail of veffels with all their contents, confifting of, belide failors and foldiers, 760 barrels of flour, 675 ditto of beef, 376 firkins of butter, 3 barrels of powder, 4 nine and fix pounders, cannon cartridges and ball, 2380 musket cartridges, eight chests of arms, 200 pair of shoes, and a quantity of intrenching tools; all of which proved very acceptable to the continental troops, who had no redundancy of any articles whatever. In the preceding midnight, governor Carleton was conveyed, in a boat, with muffled paddles, by a fecret way to the Three Rivers, and arrived fafe at Quebec the Sunday following.

Notwithflanding the advanced and fevere feafon, general Montgomery marched on for the capital, expecting to be joined by colonel Arnold and his detachment in its neighbourhood, and defigning to complete the reduction of Canada before the arrival of any British reinforcement. But while he was advancing, numbers were returning. An unhappy home sickness prevailed, and no specific was so efficacious as a discharge. No sooner was it administered, but the cure of nine out of ten was perfected; who, resulting to wait for boats to go by the way of Fort George, upon their arrival at Tyconderoga, slung their heavy packs over their shoulders, crossed the lake at that place, and undertook a march of two hundred miles, with the greatest good will and alacrity. Three hundred of the continentals passed by Tyconderoga on their way home by the end of the month. The ruin of the cause was further hazarded by the turbulent and mutinous

Colonel Arnold's arrival with his detachment, at Point Levi, was not known at Quebec for twenty-four hours; and was at length discovered by his ordering out some men to secure the midshipman of the Hunter sloop of war, who was just landed on that fide the river; the boat returned and carried the intelligence to Quebec; on which two thips of war were flationed, one above and the other below Wolfe's cove, to prevent the Americans croffing over. A council was called, and by a majority of one it was agreed not to proceed immediately to attack the town. The contrary resolution, backed by vigorous exertions, would probably have put him into the possession of it. On the fifth of November it was really in a defenceless state, without a single foldier. Had the detachment croffed, the gates would, it is thought, have been opened by the difaffected and faint-hearted. The colonel however declared, that he would certainly make the attack when he had croffed, in case they were not discovered to be over. In the mean time, the troops were employed in pre-paring scaling ladders. Before they were ready with these, colonel Maclean, the deputy governor, arrived at Quebec from Sorel, [Nov. 12.] with about 170 men of his new raised regiment of emigrants; of this colonel Arnold had advice the next day, when, in the evening at nine o'clock, he began to embark his forces on board thirty-five canoes, leaving the ladders behind, and by four the next morning got over and landed 500 men wholly undiscovered. They landed in the small cove where the brave and enterprising general Wolfe did, now called Wolfe's cove. The Lizard's barge rowing up the river, the colonel ordered her to be hailed, and fired upon for refuling to come in shore; on which she pushed off, and carried the account of the detachment's having croffed over. But before this discovery, the men paraded on the heights of Abraham. From thence they fent out a reconnoitering party toward the city, marched across the plain, and took pollellion of a large house formerly owned by general Murray, and other adjacent houses, which afforded Vol. I. 3 K fine 442

fine accommodations for the troops. Guards were placed on the different roads to cut off the communication between the city and country. The main body, about noon, marched fairly in view of the enemy, and gave them three huzzas, which were returned by a few shot from the ramparts. In the evening the colonel fent a flag of truce with a demand of the garrifon, in the name and on behalf of the United Colonies, which was fired upon as it approached the walls. The colonel was certainly overfeen; he should have taken the scaling ladders along with him; have concealed his being over, and attempted a coup de main the next night, which might have been done with a prospect of success, as his Canadian friends, English and French, were in the city to fecond his operations, and as the failors were then feattered on board the ships, some about Quebec and others up the river.-[Nov. 16.] A company of men were fent to take possession of the general hospital. The Canadians were continually coming in to express their fatisfaction at the continental forces having entered the country. The next day a certain account was received of the capture of Montreal. Early in the morning [Nov. 19. the troops decamped and marched up to Point au Trembles, about feven leagues from Quebec, through a thick fettled country, where you meet, every few miles, with a handsome little chapel. This was the day on which governor Carleton arrived at Onebec; and the first thing he did, was to turn out the fufpected, and all who would not affift in the defence of the city. (Nov. 23.) By express from Montreal, the forces were informed that Montgomery was upon his march, and had fent down clothing for them. The general finding plenty of woollens at Montreal, at a reasonable price, gave his soldiers new clothes, after their having suffered much by the severity of the climate, to which they submitted with patience and resolution, particularly in marching from St. John's to Montreal, the road being half leg deep in mire. He was also mindful of colonel Arnold's detachment, which had fuffered still greater hardships. General Montgomery arrived at one o'clock, (Dec. 1.) with three armed schooners, men, ammunition, and provision, to the great joy of the colonel's forces, who toward evening turned out and marched to the general's quarters, and were there received and complimented by him upon their appearance. The next day the batteaus were fent to Point Levi for the scaling ladders. The general appeared before Quebec, (Dec. 5.) which is the last we have heard of his movements.

(Dec. 14.) General Howe iffued orders for taking down the old North meeting-house, a large wooden building, containing a great deal of timber; and a hundred old wooden dwelling houses and other buildings, to be used for suel. The scarcity of this article, now that the usual supplies from the country are cut off, will reduce the inhabitants to an extreme difficulty.

(Dec. 30.) P. S. Admiral Shuldam is just arrived from. Great-Britain in the Chatham man of war of 50 guns, to super-
